"Their Married Life"

Copyright by International News Service.

Helen, walking slowly along Madison avenue, stopped at last before an old-fashioned brownstone house and looked up at the number over the door. This must be where Laura lived, and yet the outside of the house seemed so different from anything she had imagined. Somehow she could never imagine Laura the wife of a wealthy man, the time seemed so short since the old days when Laura had had one room in an uptown apartment and had bitterly complained of the small chance a woman had alone in New York.

She rang the bell and was admitted a few minutes later by a neat maid who showed her into a large room on one side of the hall and said that she would tell Mrs. Richards. Helen had been trying ever since she had returned from the shore to call on Laura, but something had always intervened and Winifred's operation had worried her so that nothing had been enjoyable until it was over.

The room in which she was sitting was handsomely furnished with old-fashioned and very heavily carved furniture. Helen thought that everything looked as though it might have been in the family for many years, and as Laura told her later that was the case. The walls were heavily tapestried, and several exquisite paintings hung here and there, some modern works and one or two of the old school.

There was a full-length portrait of a beautiful woman dressed in glittering white material which was obviously some concoction of the artist, and near by was the picture of a child painted evidently some years ago, for the little girl in the picture, who might have been taken for "The Age of Innocence," was only about five, and Helen remembered that Laura had told her that Mr. Richards' daughter was eleven. Helen was fascinated by the picture. She wondered vaguely if little Joan Richards was as beautiful now as she had been several years ago and was still gazing at the portrait when Laura came into the room.

"Helen, is it really you? Why, I thought you were never coming to see me."

Laura Asks Helen to Go to Her Domain

"And I thought I'd never get here, so much has happened since I saw you last."

"Well, let's go upstairs into my own domain. I think it will be more cheerful, and we can have a good, old-fashioned talk."

Helen followed Laura upstairs into a charming little sitting-room, done in rose-colored cretonne. "This is my own special sanctum where I work and read and really feel like myself. I don't let every one up here, you know, but oh, Helen, it seems so good to see you."

"And you, dear, are you happy? I was surprised to get your announcements. I thought you were not to be married until later this Fall."

"At first we did think that would be better, but after all there was no reason why we should wait, and I needed the rest, and so we just got married very quietly. No one was present but a friend of Mr. Richards and Joan. Oh, Helen, you must see my little girl. I am so very proud of her."

"Is that her picture downstairs? I never saw such a beautiful child. Is she really as pretty as that?"

"More so, because she is older now. She isn't home from school yet. I always give her permission to stay out until 4.30 if it is clear, and she walks with some of the other girls and one of the teachers."

"Laura," said Helen suddenly, "do you know that you have grown to be a very stunning looking woman?"

Laura flushed and smiled happily, looking at Helen almost shyly.

"I think it's just because I am so very happy," she said softly, "and, then, of course, I don't have to think of expense when I am shopping!"

The Little Girl Is Much Interested in Helen's Girl

"I am very proud of my home," went on Laura, conscious that Helen admired her dress and proud of the fact that she could wear gowns of which Helen approved. "Of course, we have not been in it long, and I have met few of Mr. Richards' friends, but this winter we shall probably do some entertaining. I want you and Mr. Curtis to come over to dinner some time soon. Do you know, Helen, I can never forget all that you have done for me—never!"

"All that I have done for you," mocked Helen laughingly. "Why, I'd like to know what I have done—nothing so wonderful that I can remember!"

At that moment the door was opened softly and a little girl stood upon the threshold.

"Come over and meet Mrs. Curtis, dear," said Laura sweetly, and the child came over obediently and slipped a cool little hand into Helen's as she said "How do you do?"

Helen was almost spellbound at the child's loveliness. Her hair was a peculiar shade, almost red, but more of a russet color, with plenty of warmth in it. Her eyes were unfathomable as she glanced at her again and again she could hardly determine the color of them, they seemed to change so often. The girl was very grave. She regarded Helen with a calm assurance that Helen thought unusual in a child, but when Laura mentioned that Mrs. Curtis had a little daughter, too, Joan turned to Helen with a radiant smile and asked how old she was.

"Not old enough to play with you, dear. I'm sorry to say. My little daughter is only five."

"But I like little girls; I like to play with them. Mother, you will take me over to see Mrs. Curtis' little girl, won't you?"

"Of course, dear, some day soon. Run out and tell Mary to bring tea, won't you? and then come back after you have taken off your things."

Joan ran to the room and Helen's eyes followed her as though she couldn't take them away.

Tea was served a few minutes later and afterward Helen rose to go.

All the way home Helen thought of Laura and her home and her little daughter. She remembered having seen Mr. Richards once down town and there had been nothing very handsome about his appearance. Joan must have taken after her mother, the beautiful woman in the heavy gold frame downstairs in the big, silent drawing-room. Helen wished now that she had looked more closely at the mother's picture.

Anyway, Laura was supremely happy and very lucky. Not that she would change places with her in any respect, but it must be rather nice to be so wealthy; particularly nice for a woman like Laura, who had never had anything in the world, not even anyone to care for her. No doubt, too, Laura would have children of her own some day. She would be an ideal mother and would have plenty of means to bring children up properly. And then Helen thought of Winifred with a little throb of joy in her heart. How wonderful it was to be a mother. After all, the world was a very good place to live in if one could only think so all the time.

Another installment of this very interesting series will appear here soon.

FOR AUTUMN AND WINTER COSTUMES

Fashionable Coats Must Flare but are of Various Lengths.

By MAY MANTON

3/4 Three-Quarter Coat, 34 to 44 bust.

The coat of the season may be of almost any length, but below the hips it must flare to give a ripple effect. Preferably the skirt beneath should be narrow, for this is just the effect sought, but whether that skirt shall be of a contrasting material or a matching one depends entirely on the special needs or taste. This costume is of gabardine and velvet and that combination is exceedingly smart, but if the skirt as well as the coat were of gabardine the effect would be equally fashionable if not quite as handsome. If the three-quarter length is not becoming, the coat can be cut off as indicated in the back view. Gabardine, cheviot, broadcloth and velvet are favorite materials for suits while an exceedingly handsome effect is obtained by making the entire coat of velvet with the skirt of gabardine or of one of the new moiré silks which are heavy enough for suitings and are to be much worn. The lines of the coat are simple and becoming, every seam tending to give the effect of slenderness and height.

For the medium size will be needed 7 yards of material 27 inches wide, 4 1/2 yards 44, 3 1/2 yards 50, with 3/8 yard of velvet for collar and cuffs.

The May Manton pattern No. 8418 is cut in sizes from 34 to 44 inches bust measure. It will be mailed to any address by the Fashion Department of this paper, on receipt of ten cents.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

In business it may mean a fortune. Reputation makes reputation. Therefore it is essential that the name of your establishment stands out prominently with the merchandise you have for sale. An attractive name plate not only serves to embellish your advertisement but it makes the name stand out in decided contrast from the sameness of type in the group of advertisements around yours. Miss Fairfax Answers Queries

HE WAS NOT FAIR TO YOU.

DEAR MISS FAIRFAX:

A number of years ago I kept company with a young man. On account of some talk of which not a word is true he gave me up. Which I asked him to explain he said he would never mention it and I should try to forget him. I loved him dearly and tried to forget but could not. Long after we parted I heard from a friend what the reason was. I was very much surprised and could not blame him. My pride had the best of me, otherwise I would have brought up the subject. He has no idea I love him still, as I am very distant when we meet, which is rarely. He is a widower now and sometimes I think he must think of me, as there is not a day that my thoughts are not of him.

KITTY.

WHATEVER this man heard against you years ago, it was his duty as a friend and as a gentleman to give you a chance to set yourself right. If you really feel that his opinion matters to you, write him a dignified little letter and tell him that you have just heard what it was that gave him a wrong impression of you and that for the sake of your old friendship you cannot resist the chance to try to put it right.

Women Should Take Warning

If the statement made at a New York Assembly of women, that healthy American women are so rare that they are almost extinct, is true, it is time for the women of America to take warning and look to their health. It may be headaches, backaches, dragging down pains, nervousness, mental depression, that are tell-tale symptoms of some organic derangement for which Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound—a simple remedy made from roots and herbs—is specific and may be relied upon to restore women to a healthy normal condition.—Advertisement.
