The Path of Prudence in Public Office

Remarkable Pronouncement by China's Philosophic President

By CHANG LING-KO (Special Correspondence) Peking.—Undaunted by the dangers confronting his country on every side, undisturbed by the weight of many conflicting responsibilities, Yuan Shih-kai, president of China, still finds time to devote to his chief labor of love, the setting down in official state papers of great truths in pithy form for the benefit of his contemporaries and posterity. To the most worthwhile Chinese, as well as to practically the entire foreign community in China, the mandates of Yuan Shih-kai are an enduring source of refreshing treats. Outside the Chinese classics, and, indeed, the very greatest of these, there is nothing to touch them for truth, wisdom, the gentleness of the father, and the certainty of the scholar. And among his finest official utterances as president of China is the latest of all, which might be called "The Path of Prudence in Public Office."

held in reverence and awe as if they belonged to Heaven, can be sported and utilized for the purpose of gratifying the desires of friends and acquaintances. The officials should remember that their salaries are drawn from the people, that the income of an ordinary official is enough to provide for nine families of farmers. It is impossible even for Emperors Yao and Shun to give liberally and satisfy the desires of all persons. It is most unjust for those who do not toil or spin to waste the means for the sustenance of the people. Moreover, such conditions form a fertile bed for harmful tares which cut short and make impossible the growth of valuable cereals in the official field. "China is now undergoing grave trials. The times are hard. Difficulties and dangers are staring at the country on all sides. Even if we fill all posts with capable men, we still fear that we may be unable to triumph over our difficulties. If we allow ourselves to be swayed by private and selfish considerations in making appointments and overlook the maxim of competence, we should well ask, 'Where is our conscience?' This thought should make us sweat for shame. "The disciplinary regulations for officials prohibit the giving and taking of gifts partaking the nature of bribes, the asking of favors for friends or relatives, or the abuse of authority for the benefit of one's self or friends. Cases of violations shall be investigated by the punishment board. The regulations governing the collection of revenues also prohibit the employment of unworthy men on the strength of friendship, and the coercing of officials to employ the persons recommended. The prohibitions are hereby reiterated. Hereafter any official receiving requests for favors shall expose the deeds of the offenders whom censors shall impeach. "The officials who have power to recommend or engage the members of their staff shall use the power discreetly and wisely and appoint only competent persons."

BRITISH CANNOT MAKE DYES, SAYS SCIENTIST

Professor Perkins, President of Chemical Society, Says Efforts Are Futile

which it is now in danger of losing. Heretofore England imported these products from the now hostile countries in order to resell them among its world-wide clientele. London papers state that the exhibition is "uncommonly interesting and instructive. Visitors of the commercial class praise its great usefulness and state that they had had no conception of the extent to which the applied arts in Germany were utilized commercially. "That is in the last analysis an acknowledgment of the bitter feeling which the "made in Germany" has called forth. The English are now trying to wrest from others what they were too lazy or too stupid to produce themselves. "British Fail to Make Dyes In the same category is the distress of the English dye industry. The plan of rescue undertaken by the government has been again condemned by one of the most recognized experts. This time it is W. H. Perkins, who is not only professor of chemistry in Oxford and president of the Chemical Society, but is the son of the late Sir William Perkins, who is considered in England to be the inventor of aniline dyes. "We say "considered," for aniline itself was invented by Unverdorben, and the first aniline dye was made by Beisenhitz in 1853, both of whom were Germans. Three years later Sir William Perkins first put an aniline dye on the market. Professor Perkins discussed his question of British manufacture of dyes in an address on the conditions in the organic chemical industry at the annual meeting of the Chemical Society. Professor Perkins explained repeatedly why the plan of the government is meeting with opposition. He stated that Sir William Perkins had sold his factory in 1874 not only because he wanted to devote himself to his scientific investigations, but also because he recognized that his products could not compete with the rising German competition as long as they did not have a number of competent chemists for the development of the methods in use, and especially for new inventions. "No Available Scientists Such recruits were sought in vain at the English universities, for many of these, especially Oxford and Cambridge, but also the Scotch universities, had not contributed anything in the last half of the previous century to the advancement of organic chemistry, whereas in Germany, as soon as the great importance of tar products had become known, special schools for that purpose were established by such teachers as Liebig, Wohler, Kekule and Baeyer. "Professor Perkins expressed his appreciation of the fact that a few newly founded English universities had devoted more attention to organic chemistry, but expressed his great disapproval of the existing English dye works. A comparison with the German works would redound greatly to the discredit of the former. They would have to be equipped very differently and made uniform. "For this reason also the proposal of the government to take over the present works was of very doubtful value.
