Distribute Heat in Two City Schools by New Fanning System

Heat will be distributed through the rooms of the Cameron and the Penn school buildings this Fall by electrical power, this method having been adopted by the School Board to supersede the old system.

In the Cameron building a five-horsepower motor will be installed by the Harrisburg Light and Power Company before school opens and the current will turn the great fans by which the heat will be circulated through the building. By this scheme the supply of heat can be readily regulated by the mere turning of a switch.

In the Penn building a similar system will be installed, except that a much larger motor will be set up.

Police Looking For Boys Who Tie Ropes Over Paths

Falling over a wire stretched across a path in Reservoir Park, last evening, J. Roy Seidel, aged 15, fell and broke his arm.

The police are searching for a band of boys who they believe make a practice of tying ropes across paths and dark places and then hide themselves to watch pedestrians fall.

This fact, combined with the fact that his outstanding debts were unusually large, and his creditors unusually active, had made him cast about for an avenue of escape that would clear his every path of dunning tradespeople and at the same time allow him to continue his life of luxurious extravagance in the accustomed manner. Marriage seemed the only way out, and the eligible list, that is, the people of any (bank book) account, was markedly limited. In fact, there was only one in town whose fortune was reassuring enough to compensate for the disadvantages of restricted hours and a life half taken up in leaving and receiving cards. He had decided to "risk it," as he presumptuously phrased it to himself, and accordingly, a few months before, had started to make frequent calls at the Logan mansion, in an effort to become "better acquainted."

Scott had decided that the time was ripe for "protesting his love" and called the day after Paul and his father had been at the Logan mansion. The butler showed him into the garden, telling him that Miss Anita was walking there. He discovered her on Anita Learns That She Will Forget Her Fortune if She Marries.

An old rustic bench beneath a great shady willow tree, sitting, pensively thinking, the while she unconsciously pulled to threads a long green leaf that had dropped into her lap.

He dropped gracefully onto the seat beside her, and gently led the talk to personal matters. "Miss Logan," he said, "I have a question to ask, and on its answer will depend my whole future." He spoke without passion, without emotion, as befitted the scion of an old family, his voice lacking that "vulgar earnestness" so noticeable in those of mixed descent. He went on: "The Scotts have never been men of many words, and though our passions are less volatile than are those of the great majority—with a deprecating wave of his hand—they have the quality of steadiness and endurance. I'm one of the old Scotts—the last of the old Scotts, I should say (how fine that sounded!) and I assure you that in asking for your hand I do it with all the sincerity and respect a Scott can be capable of. Will you marry me?"

"Yes—Alfred," she said, blushing up at him, and in a moment she felt the dispassionate embrace and judicial kiss of the last highly evolved member of the ancient family of Scott.

"I have my car at the door, Alfred. It's been waiting for me for over an hour. Will you ride with me, out into the country? We can be alone. I feel we should be alone together."

"As you wish, dear. I shall be delighted."

"Then go out and wait for me at the gate. I shall be a minute. I want to get some wraps."

She went with swift, glad steps toward the house and he sauntered languidly to the gate.

When he reached the sidewalk, his gentle, delicate nature was shocked at the sight of John Huff, his tobaccoist, and one of his many creditors, in an attitude of deliberate waiting. Huff had seen him leave his club and had followed him to the Logan place, intent on presenting in person a bill for a couple of hundred dollars, which, mailed many times, had never elicited a response.

"Mr. Scott, sir. I've taken the liberty—"

"I should say you had taken a liberty," Scott cut in. "How dare you, sir!"

"But," pleadingly, "this bill has been running for eight months now, and I have bills myself must meet. Couldn't you make a small payment, say fifty dollars or so on account? I assure you, I shouldn't have presumed, had I not needed it very badly."

"I can't talk of this matter now," Then, suddenly, as he saw a nasty glint harden the other's eye, "Listen, Huff, in a conciliatory tone, "and don't let this go any further," confidentially—"I expect to marry the mistress of this house very shortly," with a look of subtle assurance, "and then I shall settle in full. In the meantime, don't make yourself evident. Go away now. Any moment, 'Don't,' or heaven's sake and yours let her see you here. Go. Go away!"

"Yes, sir,"—with a servile bow—"but you'll—"

"Everything! Only go!"

The man smiled reassuringly, turned, and was gone.

A moment later, Anita, dressed for motoring, and looking infinitely happy, appeared at the gate.
