Just at the time that Irwin and Clay had decided that this confession of West's would probably prove their financial salvation Stone had remembered, almost as an inspiration, that this was the night of the Van Linds' ball.

And thus it was that they met in surroundings so foreign to business and intrigue and crime—thus it was that they met beneath the entwined flags of many nations, and mumbled commonplace to the tune of modern dance music.

A partner claimed Irwin and laughingly carried him off. Clay, true to his arrangement with his partner, was more than usually cordial to Stone.

A momentary gleam of satisfaction showed in Stone's eyes as he laughingly asserted that they found a den and sent a servant for wine.

"Let's see if we can find a drink," he ventured more from force of habit than because he cared to join the city attorney in the cup that cheers.

"Too bad about old West," ventured Stone. "Yesh, hesh dead, poor fellow," hiccupped Clay.

"Had some peculiar notions," continued Stone. "He always thought I was robbing some one."

"Well and weren't you?" Clay returned with all the solemn gravity of a man well in his cups.

"I never robbed a man in my life," Stone started as if struck. And as he gazed at the swaying, pitiful figure before him, he realized that his worst fears had been well founded.

He made another effort to question the drunken man but was only answered by a foolish laugh. He had done his work too well.

"You heard the words and felt the firm grip on his collar before he realized that Irwin, anxious about his partner and searching for him, had come upon them in the lonely den."

"You thief," Irwin repeated. "First you fill a man with drink and then you rob him."

"You know better than anybody that Clay requires no help when it comes to drinking," sneered the attorney.

Irwin answered with an oath and there was a struggle as the younger man broke away from him. Leaping back with an agility remarkable in a man who had so little outdoor training, Stone seized one of the empty bottles and raising it, rushed at Irwin as if to brain him.

Quick as his opponent had been, Irwin was quicker and his silver plated revolver spoke before Stone had covered half the distance between them.

With a crash the upraised bottle thundered to the floor and Stone, smothering an oath, grasped his wounded right hand with his left.

Clay slowly sank, an inert mass across the table. And then it was that the curtain was violently pulled aside, and then, it was that the horrified and startled dancers at Mrs. Van Linds' ball gazed in spell-bound wonder at the unfinished tragedy that was to mean ruin to so many lives.

CHAPTER V. 'Twas the day after the Van Linds' ball. Stone had left the dance immediately after the closing scene in the den, and had spent the night daylight with a party of his gay companions.

And now, looking fit and debonaire, despite his revels of the night before, he was calling on Mrs. Blake.

She could not hide the infatuation she felt for him, and solicitously she examined his bandaged hand.

"It's a mere scratch," he lightly assured her, and adroitly he turned the conversation to Mrs. Clay and her losses.
