"Their Married Life"

They had reached San Diego and had spent a day at the beautiful exposition there. Helen was entranced with the place and they planned to spend several days before leaving for the Grand Canyon.

Helen came home exhausted from a strenuous day's sightseeing. They had left early that morning and every one was tired and cross.

"I am so tired that I can hardly walk," complained Helen, as they entered the lobby of the hotel.

"Well, go right upstairs," said Louise, "and you men can come up when you feel inclined."

"I am coming with you," said Warren.

And so they all went up together. Helen sank into an easy chair and watched Warren count the money in his vest pocket. He scowled so fiercely that she burst out laughing and asked what was the matter.

"Matter enough," he said, crossly. "We've spent an awful lot of money. I call it crazy to spend $4 a day for rooms."

"I do, too, dear, but you know I wanted to economize a little and you wouldn't have it."

"This fact did not serve to make Warren feel any better."

"I suppose you haven't enjoyed staying in the best hotels."

"Why, yes, Warren, but I do think we have been extravagant."

Warren was silent a minute, and then began again on another subject.

"This is the last trip I will ever come on anyway. I'm tired of the way you act every time a man speaks civilly to you."

Helen started up and looked at him with wide-eyed amazement.

"Helen is Amazed."

"Why, Warren, what on earth do you mean?"

"Playing injured innocence," he sneered. "Well, it doesn't go with me. I suppose you haven't flirted all day long with that fellow in the uniform."

"You mean that fellow?"

"Of course I didn't flirt with him. He was more than kind to us taking us around and showing us things that we wouldn't ordinarily have seen."

"And inviting himself out to lunch with us?"

"Well, I'm sure I didn't ask him, Warren. I think you are unreasonable."

Helen felt all her blood rush to her head; the injustice of the accusation made her furious.

"If an unreasonable man? Well, I warrant you that Bob and Louise noticed it, so I am not the only one."

"Noticed what?"

"His attention to you and you weren't very quick to resent it, either."

She began to cry suddenly, partly from anger and partly from sheer weariness and inability to refute Warren's remarks, which were calculated to hurt as much as possible.

"That's right," he said disgustedly, "cry, a woman's only argument, and yet some of you want to vote."

"I suppose you are jealous," said Helen, furiously through her tears.

"Yes, I am," he said, "because you flirt openly with a man you are conceited enough to think that I am eaten up with jealousy."

Helen buried her face in her hands and sobbed "quietly." She knew that she would make an effort to stop the quarrel. She heard Warren move around the room, but she did not look up. Perhaps he would think that she had fallen asleep.

"I wouldn't care," he said after a respite of a few minutes, "if you would own up to it afterward, but when you deny making eyes and trying all these fascinating wiles on the men it makes me laugh."

"But I tell you, Warren, I will deny it. If you only knew how you are hurting me."

"I suppose you weren't the one who suggested Captain Parker's taking us around."

"Yes, I volunteered, yes, but I thought you would all like it."

Warren shrugged his shoulders in a maddening way, and Helen again relapsed into silence. She was wondering what he would say next when a knock was heard at the door.

"Curtis?" said the bellboy.

"Yes."

"A telegram for you ma'am."

Helen took the yellow envelope and handed it to Warren.

"I wonder what it can be, dear," she said, her anger swallowed up by her curiosity.

Warren tore open the envelope and handed it to her after a quick look.

"Call from the office," he volunteered.

"We'll have to cut short our stay."

"Shall we leave to-morrow?"

"Sure, first class, I wonder what Bob and Louise will say."

"We'll miss the Grand Canyon."

"That's right, start to grumble the first thing. You'd better telephone to Louise's room and ask her what she is going to do. They may want to stay over."

"Why, don't you telephone and ask Bob?" questioned Helen coolly. "I'll have to pack right away and you have nothing else to do."

NEW AND SMART ACCESSORIES

Over-Bodies that can be Utilized with Any Blouse and Skirt.

By MAY MANTON

All forms of the over-bodice are fashionable this autumn, and here are two excellent ones, that can be made from many different materials. They give a smart and up-to-date touch to the costume and are so exceedingly simple that any woman who understands plain sewing can make them in the least little bit of time. Over a white costume, they are charming made of bright colored taffeta. They are very pretty made of the material to match the skirt and worn over a blouse of thinner material, either the same or of contrasting color, and they can indeed be put to numberless uses.

No. 1 is very simple with only shoulder and under-arm seams; the fulness is held in place at the waist by means of ribbon passed through buttonholes or slits cut for the purpose. No. 2 combines a plain back with full fronts and is shirred at the waist line. It can be finished with a straight or a pointed edge. Later, the over-bodices will be charming made from light weight velvets and materials of the sort. Among the new velvets are flowered effects and it would make most picturesque garments of this kind to be worn over skirts of plain color.

No. 1 will require for the making, 2 1/2 yds. of material 27 in. wide, 1 1/2 yds. 36, 1 1/2 yds. 44, with 3/4 yd. 27 for collar and revers; for No. 2 will be needed 2 1/2 yds. 27 in. wide, 1 1/2 yds. 36, 1 1/2 yds. 44.

The pattern No. 8766 is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 in. bust measure. It will be mailed to any address by the Fashion Department of this paper, on receipt of ten cents.

DROWNS SAVING HIS "WARSHIP"

In the fashionable neighborhood of Riverside Drive, a little boy from the upper East Side, New York, was sailing some toy boats on the Hudson which he called his "warships."
