Ten Known Dead, Twenty Missing in Chicago Fire; Homeless Thousands Suffer

Chicago, Ill., Feb. 3.—Handicapped by the coldest weather of the winter, workmen to-day searched for bodies in the ice-covered ruins which marked the site of the West Side tenement house wrecked by an explosion early yesterday. Of the seventy-two persons known to have been in the building at the time of the explosion, presumably caused by leaking gas, ten were known to be dead and twenty were missing to-day. Seven of the bodies recovered had been positively identified and the others were believed to be those of Henry Spitzley, 45 years old, and his two nephews, Walter and George Spitzley, both young boys.

Thirty hours after the explosion the rescuing workers abandoned hope that additional persons might yet be alive.

Throughout the night searchlights played on the ruins and ambulances were kept in waiting. As rapidly as one exhausted shift of rescue workers stepped from the wreckage a fresh group, armed with shovels, picks and axes, jumped into the vacant places.

Much suffering was reported among the two thousand tenement dwellers whose homes within a radius of several blocks had been destroyed or damaged by the force of the blast. Numbers of funds were established by individuals and organizations to distribute relief to the homeless sufferers, whose want was accentuated by the low temperature.
