STANDARD PRICE FOR BREAD, 7 CENTS POUND

of cost of bread due to wholesale delivery cost and retailers' profits. This practice, if adopted by the public, will cut three cents a pound from bread under present prices.

All commercial bakers are to be put under government control and regulation by the President's proclamation. The license system becomes effective December 1.

Mr. Hoover has issued a long statement of his plans and then had a conference, lasting about an hour with newspaper correspondents, during which he answered questions about his plans. He said bakers would be permitted to retain their trademarks. "They may call it what they like, so long as they make it according to standard," he said, adding that about fifteen different varieties of bread in the city of Washington alone will disappear. He declared milling percentages of wheat, now averaging about 73 or 74 per cent of the whole wheat, may be increased about 4 per cent.

Mr. Hoover's statement follows: "Based on the extensive investigations by the representatives of the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of the Interior, we have determined upon the standardization of the bakers' bread in the country, and the President will to-day issue a proclamation to that end.

The bread of the United States is approximately 40 per cent, baked in bakeries and 60 per cent, in the homes. The object of standardization is to reduce the cost of public baking and to eliminate the waste of flour and to limit the use of sugar and lard in the proportion of bakery bread. By fixing the weight of bread to one pound minimum loaf, with one and a half pound, two and four-pound loaves, and with a stabilized price of flour, the present variations in bread will be largely eliminated and competition will be centralized upon price.

The Administration has no power to fix the price. There are grocery stores in many cities whose whole business is conducted upon a basis where the consumer pays cash and carries the goods home and who conduct their own bakeries. It is anticipated that a standard one-pound loaf of baked bread can be put before the public from these groceries at about seven cents. The other type of grocers doing business upon a credit and delivery basis must charge more.

Regulation on Returning Bread "Competitive conditions have built up a number of practices in bread which can be limited to the advantage of the industry and the public. The food administrator and the commercial economy committee of the Council of National Defense have already requested the bakers of the country to refuse acceptance of returned bread, and this will now be made a legal regulation. The investigations show that a large proportion of returned stale bread was actually destroyed, and that the amount of flour so lost amounts to upward of 600,000 barrels per annum. The regulation that bakers shall not accept the return of bread will force the retailers and public to watch their purchases more carefully.

The use of other ingredients than flour, yeast and salt in a great deal of the American bread has been growing steadily for years and exists to a larger degree than elsewhere, and without any intrinsic compensation in either added nutritive value or palatableness. In order to conserve the use of sugar, a maximum of three pounds of cane or beet sugar per barrel of flour is fixed by the food administrator, against an average consumption of about six pounds, and it is expected that a saving of about 100,000,000 pounds of sugar per annum will result.

A maximum of two pounds of shortening is imposed against an average consumption of about six pounds and the use of vegetable oil as a larger substitute is required. The saving in lard should amount to 100,000,000 pounds per annum. The milk used in bread is limited to skimmed milk, as the microscopic amount of butter fat which appears in whole-milk bread gives no adequate compensation for its use for this purpose.

Generally the standardization of the bread should lay the foundation for the elimination of many wasteful practices forced upon the bakers and distributors by the luxurious demands of the public for various types of bread.

To Change Ingredients "What will happen now is the total elimination of lard in making bread, also of sugar and milk," said the manager of the Standard Bakery. "Few use milk even now, but it will be passed up entirely. Instead of lard we are given to understand that Hoover will suggest certain vegetable oils. Another way of economizing is by substituting corn and what is called 'inferior' flour. This flour is just as nourishing and digestible but not quite the class of the 'quality' flour. But it will have to be used in conjunction with corn meal. The government cannot dictate both weight and price. There is nothing to hinder us from baking a loaf weighing over sixteen ounces, but if this standard is established and certain economies made the public will get perfectly good bread and for a moderate price."

Save on Wrappers Bernard Schmidt, of the Schmidt Bakery, was of this opinion, and he suggested another means for the consumer to save on bread, namely, by accepting the loaf without the wrapping. "This wrapping, counting the material and labor," said he "costs about one-half a cent a loaf. If customers show a desire to save on their bread eating let them show it to the bakeries and they will gladly cooperate. The delivery is costly to us and I think that arrangements could be made to establish branch offices where people could come in person and buy, so as to save on delivery expenses."

Until final decision comes from Hoover in Washington there will be no change in the present bread selling rates here.
