ADAMS PEACHES ONLY HALF CROP

Fruitgrowers Say Orchards on High Ground May Yield Well; Lower Trees Fail

Gettysburg, Pa., July 29.—This week will see the harvesting of the early varieties of peaches in Adams county, and the statement is given out by the growers in the northern end of the county that the crop, early and late combined, will be little more than half a crop. Several of the larger Adams county orchards situated on high ground will have large yields, but those which are lower were hit heavily by the cold of last winter and the trees far down will have practically no fruit.

It is said that no orchards of any size report more than a three-fourths crop at the outside, while many of them will have only a half crop or less. This prediction comes so late in the maturing season may be taken to be safe, unless hail or some other unavoidable weather should come along before time for picking.

Preparations are now under way to take care of the fruit very quickly. For some years the Adams county growers have used girls and women for both picking and packing. They have proved highly satisfactory and they are always available before the canning plants open.
