"Vee, let's risk wheat cakes and coffee!" cried Phoebe briskly as soon as our breakfast party was established at Wild's in the early morning hours following on Valerie Cosby's dance. "You know we haven't a thing of importance to do until our 10 o'clock fittings at Wickhams Monday—so we can be rash together."

"I'm with you, Jennie," laughed Jim. "Who else follows the host and his dancing sisters?"

"What Vee ventures I also dare," declared Sheldon.

My mind was on something more vital than wheat cakes, however, and I leaned across to address Virginia.

"Will you drop by for me, Jennie, on your way to Wickhams? I want to order some things."

I had decided that since Jim wouldn't give me an allowance and had offered no credit and charge accounts, I might as well seize on my benefits. And, furthermore, I wasn't going to be shabby again in the well-dressed world of Jim's new friends.

"How does it help you make money?" I broke in. "To take Phoebe and Jennie and Evvy and the Cosbys and Sheldon and Tom and Dick West out and spend a hundred dollars on them?"

"A hundred dollars! Anne you are a piker. I expect my theater party to cost about three times that. And I expect to see and be seen and get a reputation for prosperity and work my way into the right bunch."

"All right, Jim. Have it your own way."

"Thank you, I will. And, mind you look a little less like a frump."

"I promise you'll pay the bills, I'll never look like a frump again." I cried chokingly, hurt almost beyond endurance.

"So as far as you like," urged Jim.

"I will. Now watch me."

"Oh, I won't have to watch you, Anne. You're a natural miser. You'll never learn to make a showing or to spend half I earn."

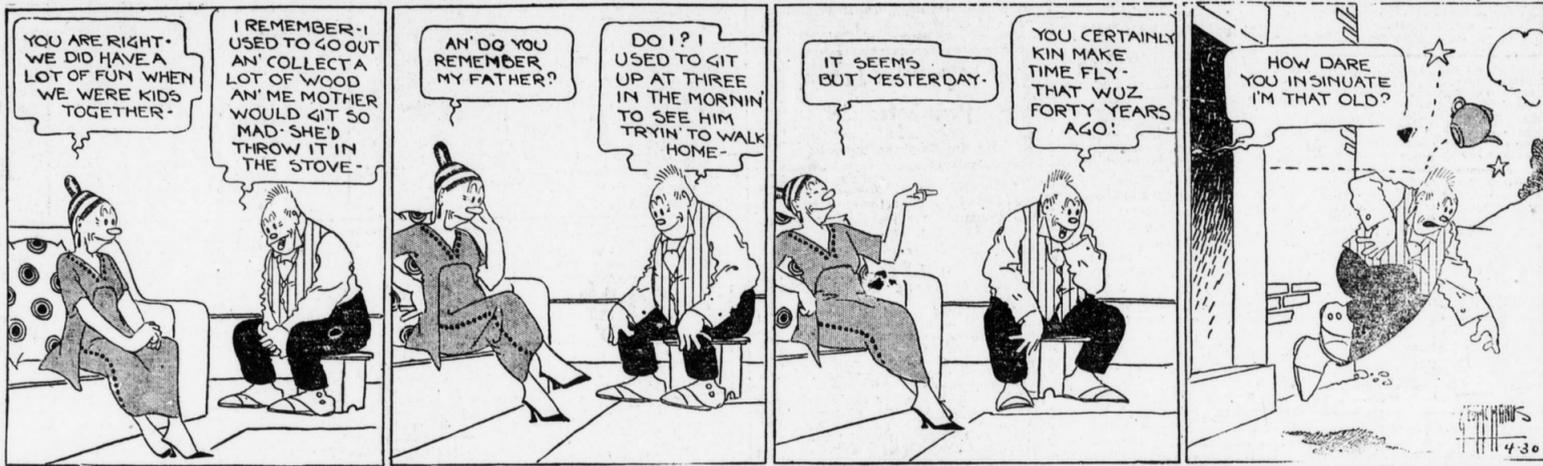

"I wonder," I replied bitterly. "I wonder—most women can spend money fast enough—once they get started. I think—I'm started, Jim."

CHAPTER II
(Copyright, 1919, by Star Company.)

It was not strange that, reviewing the circumstances already cited, David DeLaine was depressed.

The trip to and from Baltimore had taken some of his money. A much needed suit of civilian clothes had taken more. After he had paid a week's advance rent on his room, he had just ten dollars in his pocket.

"Something's got to be done, and pretty quick too!" he muttered.

He had been to several employment agencies, but the fact that he must have outdoor work made it difficult for him to secure a situation.

Of course, there was labor on a farm—but David DeLaine had never lived in the country and knew nothing about farming or gardening.

As to heavy work, that was out of the question just yet.

"There is only one thing I can do," he muttered, "and that is drive a car. It would be somewhat of a come-down to be a chauffeur—but it looks as if that's the thing for me. I suppose I might drive a brewer's truck."

David DeLaine felt the blood rush to his face. He suspected now that this was Desiree Leighton's father. If so, DeLaine could not reveal his identity. Such being the case, he could not ask any of his acquaintances for reference—for who would give him one if he used an assumed name?

Then he thought suddenly of an elderly man who had been a dear friend of his father's. He lived in South Carolina. Perhaps if David wrote to him, telling him that he wished to remain unknown, as he was obliged to take a position as a chauffeur, Mr. Carey might consent to write a letter recommending him.

"You can, of course, give me good references?"

Mr. Leighton was repeating his question.

"I—I am afraid not—I mean—perhaps the one I could give you would not suit you," the young man stammered.

"Why not?"

"Because it would come from a distance—from South Carolina—and you might want one from some-four." I wonder if by any chance he is any relation to the dame that Aunt Jeanne wanted to tie fast to me. Wouldn't it be funny if it was! I declare," with a laugh, "I'm going downtown to see this man! It will have the spice of adventure any way."

"Of course, he's no kin to the poor girl who—if she ever—ard of me—hates me as much as I detest the thought of her. But I certainly am an experienced chauffeur, and that is what this bird wants. As to being trustworthy—well, I hope I'm that too."

An hour later he was facing Samuel Leighton in his downtown office, and was answering sundry questions as to his ability and experience.

In a Quandry

"I must be careful about the kind of man I engage," Leighton was saying. "I want one who can drive my daughter and as she is the only woman in the family—I mean she has no mother—she must go about a great deal alone. You can, of course, furnish good references?"

David DeLaine felt the blood rush to his face. He suspected now that this was Desiree Leighton's father. If so, DeLaine could not reveal his identity. Such being the case, he could not ask any of his acquaintances for reference—for who would give him one if he used an assumed name?

HAS NO LAWS TO PROHIBIT LIQUOR

Ohio Faces Dry Constitution With No Statutes to Enforce It

Columbus, O., May 10.—Just what is going to happen to the liquor traffic in Ohio after May 27, when the prohibition amendment to the state constitution, adopted last autumn, becomes effective, is a problem that is bothering state and local officials.

The State faces the situation of having a dry constitution but no statutes to enforce it. The General Assembly enacted enforcement measures but they must run the gauntlet of a referendum next November before they can become operative and should the voters disapprove of them there will be no particular authority by which to enforce prohibition, it is said. Anti-Saloon League officials say they have not given up hope of obtaining some legislation that will be effective May 27.

Most of the saloon keepers are planning to quit business May 27 and they may have to retire even before that date. The license year of saloon keepers expires May 24. None has applied for renewal of license and the time for making application has passed.

The Ohio Home Rule Association, the "wet" organization, is planning its campaign to defeat the enforcement bills next November. It has

Wealth of Methodism Twenty-five Billions

Baltimore, Md., May 10.—Practical business men, directing the big Centenary program of the Methodist Church, in a review of the wealth of the church membership, assert that the full amount of $105,000,000 for Centenary world work could be easily raised if every Methodist would each contribute a penny a day for five years.

The wealth of the present Methodist Episcopal constituency is estimated at not less than $25,000,000,000 on the basis of the average per capita wealth of the nation, and it is increasing at the rate of $1,000,000,000 a year.

Figures just compiled show that the Methodist Episcopal Church raised for all purposes last year approximately $50,000,000 in which is included $3,000,000, the regular income of the board of foreign missions and the board of home missions and church extension.
