Widow Can Not Claim Payments if She Did Not Enforce Court Support Orders

Where a widow was not residing with her husband at the time of his death and not receiving support from him, even though an order of court had been made for the husband to contribute to family support, she is not entitled to compensation for his death according to a ruling made by the State Compensation Board in Hyde vs. Pennsylvania Railroad, a Philadelphia case. In this case the testimony shows that the wife left the husband, "probably for good cause," and that although a municipal court order was made for him to contribute to support, he did so only for a time and then stopped the effort to enforce the wife to locate him and enforce collection not being successful. The testimony shows that she supported herself thereafter.

In Kadjan vs. American Brake Shoe and Foundry Co., Erie, the final receipt is set aside because it shows that the candidate of the claimant's eye had not been removed, while compensation is awarded in Buckley vs. Lackawanna Railroad, Scranton, wherein a difference between a death certificate and an insurance report as to death cause was the subject of considerable litigation. The Board set aside a petition to review agreement in Molnar vs. Lehigh Valley Coal Co., Wilkes-Barre, saying "The accident has left the claimant's left foot in such condition that it hinders the use of his leg and he is unable to work, and is amputated. This operation would restore the use of the leg. There is no suggestion that the defendant has not fulfilled its obligations as far as furnishing medical service is concerned."

New hearings have been granted in Kuen vs. Lehigh Coal Co., Wilkes-Barre, and in Molnar vs. Lehigh Valley Coal Co., Wilkes-Barre, saying "The accident has left the claimant's left foot in such condition that it hinders the use of his leg and he is unable to work, and is amputated. This operation would restore the use of the leg. There is no suggestion that the defendant has not fulfilled its obligations as far as furnishing medical service is concerned."
