SAMMIES OFF FOR DAYLIGHT
RAID ON ENEMY'S TRENCHES

This photograph shows a party of American soldiers starting across "no man's land" for a raid on the enemy's trenches. There's a story of bravery behind every one of the terse official announcements that "Americans raided the enemy's trenches and brought back prisoners." No artillery preparation, no gas barrages—"no nothing." But there are always more Sammies volunteering for the raids than can be used. Such pecking at the Huns serves a purpose. It keeps the Huns busy, strikes at their morale and gives the American officers definite information of great value on what the enemy is doing and what his positions are like.

Swing, of the field artillery, who was aide to the general in France. The marriage will take place very soon. Then each of the sisters will be daughter of an officer and wife of an officer.

NEWS PICTURES OF THE AETNA BLOW-UP AT PITTSBURG

SNAPPED DURING THE EXPLOSIONS

WHAT WAS LEFT OF MAIN PLANT

The picture on the left was snapped while the explosives at the Aetna Chemical plant were actually "going off." No, the photographer didn't have an advance tip that the disaster was coming—but explosions continued throughout the afternoon, and the camera man, arriving on the scene after the first blasts, mounted a benzine tank, trained his lens on the chemical building and waited until it exploded. Just after the photographer got his picture a watchman saw him on the tank and yelled: "Hey, benzine in there! Beat it!" He did—just in time. The picture above shows what was left of the main building after the explosions, which left the whole plant and the town of Oakdale (Pittsburg suburb) as well, in ruins.
