PRESIDENT GOODE TO COLLEGE STUDENTS.

The Venerable Statesman Lectured Before the Boys at Richmond College Last Night.

The students of Richmond College greatly enjoyed last night an address by Hon. John Goode, president of the Constitutional Convention. At 8:15 P. M. Mitchell, in a most pleasing manner, introduced the speaker to the audience assembled in the college chapel.

Mr. Goode began by saying that it was not his purpose to enter upon the broad field of philosophical research but to give a talk in a simple and plain manner, or one who has passed the summit of life's hill. He spoke of the American republic, and how fortunate we should count ourselves in living in such a golden age and in such a prosperous country.

He has grown, he said, from a population of 3,000,000 to a population of 80,000,000. The United States is destined to become the mightiest nation under heaven.

Next came that of the professor, the doctor, the lawyer, statesman, and others. He emphasized the fact that each young man should have an aim in life. "It is right," he said, "for every man to aspire to leadership in his country. There have been leaders in the pulpits, leaders at the bar, leaders in the courts, and in the halls of some are born leaders, while others have to acquire it. If you cannot become leaders you can at least carve out your own fortunes."

In closing, President Goode said he wished he could preach a sermon, and he would like to take the liberty of saying a few words to the young men to make preparation for the great hereafter. "There is no hope but in the Star of Bethlehem."
