THREW LIGHTED LAMP. Colored Woman Thus Attempts to Separate Belligerents.

John Johnson and his wife, Pauline, a colored family living on Claiborne Street, had a free-for-all fight last night, and Johnson's mother thought her son was holding the hot end of the rod. She undertook to separate the belligerents, but her peace-making methods were by no means gentle. Seizing a lighted lamp, she hurled it at Pauline with all her strength, striking Pauline full in the face, shattering the lamp and severely damaging the expression of Pauline's countenance. Remarkable to relate, the oil did not catch, or there would have been a tragedy. Dr. Witten, of the ambulance corps, sewed up the cut places in Pauline's countenance.

CIPRIANO CASTRO'S RISE TO GREATNESS

President of Venezuela Has Risen From Humble Birth in the Andes to the Effective Ruler of a Territory of 600,000 Square Miles.

By Charles Johnston, B. C. S. (Ret.).

President Castro is one of the few remarkable men that South America has produced. He is the second figure in Latin America to-day, Porfirio Diaz, creator of modern Mexico, being the first. To get a measure of Castro's achievement, let us see what he has actually done. Beginning in an obscure nook in the Andes, he has risen, by sheer force of individual genius, until now he is ruler, undisputed and effective ruler, of a vast territory of six hundred thousand square miles, equal in area to New England and all the Atlantic States as far as Florida, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama thrown in. It is true that the population of his realm is small, only two and a half millions; nevertheless, it is equal to that of many of the medieval kingdoms of Europe, which look big in history.

Cipriano Castro is not merely an adroit person who happens for the moment to be at the top, through some lucky turn of fortune's wheel. He fought his way up, out of practical exile. He has maintained himself, chiefly by fighting, for four years already—longer than the lifetime of any ministry in France since Sedan. He has all three years of office legally assured to him, and will undoubtedly, if still alive, be able to have himself re-elected, as Diaz did. He has faced discord at home, and the menaces of three first-class foreign powers, and is at this moment gaily negotiating with a fourth, in the intervals of court revelry, dear to his Latin heart.

Castro's rise to greatness is something like the million-dollar-a-year, the spending of which is practically altogether in President Castro's hands. Here is a fair success, in these days, where success is considered everything; and although many harsh things have been said against Castro, it is impossible to deny the remarkable character of his personal achievement. He is in his own way a personality as dominating, as magnetic as was the great Napoleon. His ascendancy, the force of his will, is the one power in Venezuela. He is unquestioned master of three million men, and carries his authority easily, with a certain superb grace, very Venetian in watch, in these melancholy and thought-ridden days. Will-power is always an interesting and formidable thing, and Emerson rightly says that Providence seldom creates a really strong will. The strength of will which Cipriano Castro has manifested from the beginning of his career is remarkable; his political ascendancy is admirable, as a study in spiritual force.

His Rise to Greatness.

There have been rulers of men who gained immense prestige by gigantic stature and physical force. William the Conqueror was one of them. Of him it was said that no hand but his could bend his bow. Earl Strongbow, the Norman invader of Ireland, was another. He fought against twenty armed knights, himself armed only with a stake, and defeated them. In these melancholy and thought-ridden days, will-power is always an interesting and formidable thing, and Emerson rightly says that Providence seldom creates a really strong will. The strength of will which Cipriano Castro has manifested from the beginning of his career is remarkable; his political ascendancy is admirable, as a study in spiritual force.

At Miraflores.

During the first four years of his presidency, Cipriano Castro has had to face two imminent dangers. The first was the Matos rebellion, which at one time bid fair to become a successful revolution. The second was the joint blockade by England, Germany and Italy, which at one time promised to become an international embargo of the first order. The Matos rebellion, however, has grown out of causes strictly economic. A great admirer of General Castro once wrote of him that in his youth Castro studied two things, political economy and the art of war. We have seen how he used his knowledge of the former; for if his intention, policy was the natural result of the latter, in the latter he was like to know which primer of the dismal science he used, whether Adam Smith or John Stuart Mill, or some of the lesser fry. To be perfectly frank, one is inclined to say that Castro's views of economics were drawn, not from England or continental Europe, but from an empiricist much more venerable than they—as an oak is more venerable than a sapling. In fact, Castro took his economic theory from the Middle Kingdom, the land of Mandarins and Jade; and his great central idea is the principle of "squeeze." He is not a capitalist, though that is the name and the industry of a nation, he existed primarily to enrich the government, and that, in Venezuela, the government was no other than Cipriano Castro. And, with his old-time energy and concentration, he put this principle into practice. The result was an accumulation of treasure, and he was well and thriftyly invested, and on the part of commercial and industrial Venezuela, much heart-burning and murmuring. Here is one of the stories they tell, in illustration of President Castro's economic theory:

One of the staple industries of his country is the raising of vast herds of cattle on the boundless llanos along the Orinoco, the equivalent of our prairies. The herds are driven to the coast, and shipped to Jamaica, to Trinidad, and other parts of the palm-decked Indies. General Castro at once perceived that here was property, and portable property at that, and he set his economic theory to work. He declared that the cattle, having eaten Venezuelan grass and drunk Venezuelan water, were deeply indebted to Venezuela, and that debts were made to be paid. So the cattle, before they might carry their treasure away to foreign shores, must pay an export tax that the coffers of the state might be filled. In this way many bolivars found their way into the treasury, and things went well from the standpoint of economic theory. But, strange to say, the cattle exporters murmured. They even threatened to go out and raise the matter in court, and ceremoniously, pointing out I know not what treaty or constitutional limitation, which made the new duty a breach of the law.

CHARLESTON STARTS WITH ITS PUNCH BOWL

Cruiser On Way to Norfolk—Admiral Dickens and Mayor Exchange Greetings.

(By Associated Press.) CHARLESTON, S. C., January 14.—The United States cruiser Charleston, Captain Winslow, which has been in port since Wednesday, sailed to-night at sun-down, for Norfolk, Va., passing out through the jetties and over the bar at dead low water, and without a pilot. Escorting the cruiser was the navy yard tug Sebago, Captain Nichols, U. S. N., the Mayor and Aldermen being on board. The cruiser carries with her the magnificent punch bowl presented by the city. Twenty thousand people on the wharves, and the Batteries saw the beautiful ship steam out of the harbor and shouted their adieus while the whistles again sounded, and a parting salute was fired. But before the tug returned the following wireless telegram was relayed on the battleship Texas: U. S. Cruiser Charleston, Jan. 14, 6:45 P. M.

Admiral Dickens: Have crossed the bar and will head our course as soon as we have said goodbye to the Sebago. Make our farewell to hospitable Charleston. Plenty of water in channel at low water.

(Signed) WINSLOW. Later in the evening the Mayor presented the following out from the Texas, hoping to catch the Charleston: Congratulations to the people of Charleston, and best wishes for your successful voyage. We thank you for going out at low water. Come back again, and often.

In answer to the latter message came one from the Charleston 11:20 P. M.: Congratulations are undeserved, for had there been any doubt as to the safety of the Charleston, I would not have attempted to go out at low water. The message contained 198 words and concluded with "Grateful acknowledgment of the splendid hospitality accorded."

(Signed) HANKKELL. Richmonders in New York. (Special to The Times-Dispatch.) NEW YORK, January 14.—Waldorf—O. J. Sands, A. R. Hurwood, C. R. Holmden; Hotel Astor—L. W. M. B. M. Michael; Murray Hill—N. B. Dahl; Cadillac—N. Stokes and wife.
