Henri Rochefort and Beranger.
One finds an interesting link with the past in the fact that Henri Rochefort began his literary career as a poet and in that character presented a poem, together with a letter of introduction, to no less a literary master than Beranger, whose reply, carefully preserved by the distinguished journalist, is interesting.
"Can it be true," Beranger wrote, "that you are only sixteen? If I had written verses so well turned at that age I should indeed have believed that a great destiny was in store for me. But then you college gentlemen are brought up, as it were, in forcing houses, whereas when I was sixteen I hardly knew how to spell. Remember, then, all the devices employed for the development of your faculties and do not be too uplifted by vanity at the praises of an old rimer, dazzled by your compliments."

And the letter concludes with a commendation to the young aspirant to return to his studies and not to challenge serious criticism by premature publication.—Wesminster Gazette.
