HUMAN BRIDGE SAVES GIRL FROM DEATH.

An incident in The Trey O'Hear's series that for the moment, threatened to end the series tragically, occurred recently in the staging of the tenth installment. That the players escaped with only one of them receiving a minor injury is due, perhaps, to the quick action of Tom Walsh, who is playing the part of Bares. According to the scenario, Mr. Walsh and George Larkin form of their bodies a human chain, suspended from a trestle, down which Miss Madison slides to escape being crushed in the wreck of two trains on the bridge. The chain worked perfectly, and all parties dropped to temporary safety below the bridge, but just as Mr. Walsh struck the ground the two trains crashed together overhead, from the corner of his eye he saw something topple off the bridge above them. Without waiting to see what it was he lunged forward, throwing Miss Madison out of the way. A fraction of a second later the ground trembled as the rear trucks of the engine struck in the spot where they had been standing. Miss Madison and Mr. Larkin escaped uninjured, but a loose piece of timber struck Walsh on the arm. A hasty examination by the physician, who always accompanies the players on their trips away from the studio, showed that the arm, though badly bruised, was not broken. Walsh's face was pretty white, but he shut his teeth together and went back to work rather than hold up the production. adv

What You Get for What You Pay

THAT, ladies and gentlemen is the big point to consider in fur buying.

In Gordon Furs you get just what you pay for, you don't buy something under a name that is not its own.

That is what the GORDON Pure Fur Law does for you—

You might gladly pay more for this fur under another name—but Gordon and dealers who sell Gordon Furs (there's one right here in town) won't stand for it.

This Marmot is a very beautiful fur,—looks quite like Mink, and very inexpensive.

Look at it next time you are down town at the store that sells Gordon Furs.
