SAVE YOUR RAGS AND PAPERS

Waste Enough Each Year to Keep the Mills Running.

Mr. Arthur C. Hastings, president of the American Writing Paper company at Holyoke, Mass., looks at the household waste situation in this way:

"The blight which has stricken the New England paper mills into their present uselessness has been a lack of materials that have been wantonly sacrificed on the family trash fire. Every large manufacturer today in the papermaking line keeps closely in touch with the supply of raw materials. This is one of the biggest responsibilities resting on his shoulders. Consequently it has been up to me to give careful consideration to this problem and to canvass it rather thoroughly.

"All the information I have been able to assemble on this subject forces me to the conviction that this country every year produces enough waste rags and papers, if saved and collected with anything like the care and diligence exercised in any of the European countries, to keep every existing paper mill producing steadily and consistently, not only making all the paper we need for our own use, but also putting us in position to furnish quite a large part of that demanded by many other countries. Anyhow, we should be able very comfortably to keep ourselves going in all the kinds of paper requiring rags and waste papers into which which rag stock has originally gone. And I repeat that we should probably be able to do some export business besides.

"If the paper mills that have fallen into disuse and decay because of an insufficient and undependable supply of waste rags and papers with which to work were right now in condition to run, and could obtain their materials at a reasonable rate, they could make a splendid record and help to found a great international trade in American made papers." — Saturday Evening Post.

Facing the Payroll

Every man who employs others has to look the payroll in the face every week or month. It will not wait. Business honor, the law of the land and the maxims of the church give the wage earner the first claim on the assets of his employer. Wages come even before taxes. The business man who is not paying his employees in full every pay day at once loses all credit the moment the banks and his creditors hear about it. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and withholding it is one of the sins that cry for vengeance.

All this is as right as it is true, but in these days of sentimental pleas for almost everybody, the employer who has to meet the payroll is forgotten, yet many an employer suffers the sharpest agony of mind and spirit when trying to meet this primary obligation. Desperate sacrifices are often made to meet the payroll. Big corporations are favorite objects of attack and abuse, but the sacrifices that some of them made in the first six or eight months of the war should never be forgotten. The largest industrial corporation in this country, or in the world, paid wages at the full scale while its shareholders went without dividends. The management had to choose between reducing wages and passing dividends. Its workmen were employed and paid full wages while the shareholders got nothing. Among the tens of thousands of its shareholders were many who were dependent upon these dividends for the necessities of life. They included widows, orphans and persons incapacitated for earning a livelihood who, when their incomes were cut off, were in sorer straits than able-bodied workmen who could do other work or could make strong appeals for help from the community which never pass unheeded. These poor shareholders—and some of them were poor indeed—hid their sufferings, and nothing was heard of that side of the struggle against what fortunately proved to be only temporary adversity.

week, his employes often gather in the streets and heap the vilest abuse upon him because he owes them two or three days' pay. Then do not think of the weeks when their employer strained every nerve to meet the payroll. They deserve their wages and always get them before other creditors are paid. Neither do employes show appreciation of efforts made to provide work for them in dull seasons when the employer often sells goods at cost or less for the purpose of keeping his operating force intact.

It is disheartening to find labor so antagonistic to capital and so unwilling to help in times of stress. This is the attitude of the well-paid and intelligent members of the four train crew brotherhoods who have officially repudiated the profit-sharing principle for which labor once clamored. In these days of unequal prosperity the rift between capital and labor has been widened by workmen who received wages twenty months ago when their employers could not afford to pay, and would not have paid except for sentimental reasons. They break agreements on which contracts have been based, and care not if their employers are ruined by a strike.—New York Commercial.
