Relics of Former Worship Craved by Modern Scientists.

RAZED BY CHRISTIANS

Tahitians Profess Faith in Christ, But Superstitiously Shun Ruins.

PAPEETE, Tahiti, Aug. 2.—The ancient lore of Tahiti is to be resurrected and the ruins of the temples of the South Pacific Islanders, ordered destroyed a century ago by Christian missionaries, are to be uncovered by excavation. Efforts to gather the relics of a forgotten worship are being vigorously prosecuted here.

Interest centers upon the great central temple of Marae at Atehuu, on Tahiti island, where human sacrifices were offered to the blood-thirsty god of war, "Oro." So completely were the wishes of the missionaries carried out that nothing remains save traces of the foundations of this extensive temple. Excavations are expected to bring to light some interesting objects, which, it is hoped, will reveal the purposes and uses of this ancient structure.

Marae, while being the chief temple of Tahiti, was not the oldest of the most important in the islands. The temple at Opoa, traces of which still remain on the island of Raiatea, was the sacred center of religion in the eastern Pacific and not until a stone from this has been incorporated in the structure did the Marae temple on Tahiti become consecrated.

It was at Marae that Captain Cook witnessed the ceremonies of human sacrifices chronicled in his "Voyage." The natives, while professing Christianity, and manifesting it by most active church attendance, have a deep fear of these places. Under no circumstances will they approach these temples at night, nor venture near them by day without great trepidation believing that should they in any way offend the sleeping gods, vengeance will come.
