ments by friends of Hamon to whom he had salked while in his deathbed. Outside of that the state merely proved that Clara was known to have carried a pistol, and offered the service car driver, Sallis, who drove her arross Texas in her flight and who said she told him she had shet a man and hoped he would die. And the defense was similar. It was confined to a few attempts to impeach Hamon's so-called "dying statements" and to its real reliance the defendants own story as told by Clara on the stand.

Before the opening of the trial it was reperfed there was an agreement among the attorneys to limit the testimony to the actual shooting Clara's flight and her life with Hamon back as far at 1913. On the night of the day the trial opened it was announced by lewyers on both sides—very guardedly, of course—that this agreement was off and that the bars were down.

There Were Lots of Tears.

But after it's all over it looks very much like the lawyers got together after that and made another agreement that they didn't let the reporters get, putting the bars carefully back in place again.

McLean Was the Real Star.

McLean affectionately known as "Wild Bill" among his friends, carried the burden of handling the case for the defense. Though he unquestionably know at the dytset that the outcome was a double-leaded cinch—that is after the states case had been outlined by the actual trial of the case in such a heady and aggressive manner that it attracted wide attention.

A typical illustration of McLean's quickmest in taking advantage of every opening came Wednesday, when Special Prosecutor Brown in questioning a winess inadvertantly referred to Clara's mother as "the old woman."

McLean was instantly on his feet, with the statement that "that old woman is as good a woman as every gave birth to any lawyer in this courtroom." Judge, sheriff, bailiff and others were equally unable to check the outburst of appliance that gaves borden to appliance that the courtroom." Judge, sheriff, bailiff and others were equally unable to check the outburst of appliance that gaves borden that to be adjourned for an hour. This is just an example. McLean took advantage of every change to get a suggestion to the jury.
