INDIAN DEAD FROM DRINKING "MOON"

Chas. Marceau, a half-breed Indian, of Hart Butte, is dead, and Walter Shields, a rancher whose place is on Birch Creek, bordering the reservation, is in jail at Conrad charged with involuntary manslaughter as a result of poison moonshine alleged to have been peddled to the dead Indian and three companions on Thanksgiving day by Shields.

Marceau, who was only 22 years of age, and said to be one of the best half-breeds on the reservation, came to his death, according to the coroner's verdict from "drinking so much moonshine he became helpless, and exposure to the cold killed him, all of which was caused by the acts of one Walter Shields for selling said moonshine to Marceau."

The Indian was found dead near Hart Butte last Friday morning, and the sheriff's office and the county coroner were at once notified. The first report was to the effect that Marceau had been shot and that Shields had committed the crime.

It developed at the investigation that Marceau with three companions started out Thanksgiving day in the search of moonshine, and they first went to the ranch of Chas. Shelton, a more or less notorious moonshiner of the Birch creek country. Not finding Shelton at home, they went to the home of Shields, where they procured a quantity of moonshine, and started back to the reservation. The stuff must have been unusually poisonous, for all four of the men became sick, and with great difficulty made their way home. Marceau became separated from the rest of the crowd, and fell from his horse, and probably lay on the ground until he froze to death.

The three men who accompanied Marceau on the fatal expedition gave substantially the same testimony and the coroner's jury brought in an unanimous verdict placing the blame on Shields.

Shields was first arrested on a charge of murder, but after the investigation the complaint was altered to involuntary manslaughter, and the defendant was formally arraigned before Judge Greene in the district court at Conrad. Bond was fixed at $2,000 which Shields claims he will be able to furnish.

The penalty for involuntary manslaughter is from one to 14 years in the penitentiary. The statutes define involuntary manslaughter as "the commission of an illegal act, which results in the death of another."

In addition to the manslaughter charge, Shields may face several other charges. If guilty, he could be held for violation of both the federal and state prohibition laws, selling whisky without a license, and selling whisky to an Indian.—Conrad Independent.

TUBERCULOSIS FACTS

The most productive and necessary people, those between the ages of 15 and 45 years, suffer most severely from tuberculosis. About 60 per cent of all tuberculosis deaths occur in this group. About seven per cent of all deaths from tuberculosis are of children under 15. One death in every 12 is caused by tuberculosis.
