COMMERCE AND WEEDS.

Interesting Problem Presented By Growth of Pests.

Burrs similar to those found in Australian wool were recently discovered in some scoured Wens wools purchased from a Bradford wool merchant. Hitherto English wool has been considered entirely free from objectionable vegetable matter such as burrs, the presence of which so depreciates the value of wool. The explanation is believed to be that the dust from some Yorkshire combing establishment has been sold for fertilizing purposes to farmers, and having been spread upon the land the seed has germinated. A local trade journal commenting on this incident states that no greater calamity could befall the English wool trade than for English wool to become infested with burrs. Rather than run such a risk by using the refuse of a wool-combing establishment it would be better to burn this fertilizing material. It might be well for American farmers to take timely warning, as in our more kindly climate the risk of introduction and multiplication might prove even greater.

A botanical observer reported a year or two ago that on the Bradford sewage works at Frizinhall he had picked up no fewer than 160 species of plants or plants which, although British, do not occur naturally in the Bradford district. Many of the plants undoubtedly owed their presence to their introduction in wool from which the seeds had been carried through the sewers. Among them were several species of medick or burr of Australian origin, which flowered and seeded abundantly; the thorn apple (Datura stramonium) also flowered and seeded; several species of Amaranthus were found, as also the "prickly poppy" of Mexico; and one composite, suspected of Oriental origin, proved a puzzle to local botanists and experts; but as wool as brought to Bradford from spots where botanists rarely penetrate, a plant new to science is not inconceivable even in the midst of a busy industrial town.—Consular Report.
