THE GREAT WORK OF A TRUE PATRIOT

His Model Government Bureau and Efforts to Save the American Forests

The management of a vast estate valued at a billion and a half dollars is a task that falls to few men. One can count upon the fingers of one hand the world's great captains of industry who have shouldered and borne to success similar responsibilities. Their names are blazoned as the kings of finance and the princes of the new regime of militant industrialism. By the Wall street and counting house standard of ethics they are heroes and prophets. This significant adulation brings out in sharper contrast, in more vivid perspective, the brilliant results accomplished in a few years of hard but unostentatious labor by Gifford Pinchot, forester, chief of the Forest Service of the Federal Department of Agriculture; founder of scientific and practical forestry in the United States, and, according to the testimony of Senator Beveridge and Congressional investigators, the creator of the model bureau in administrative efficiency of the entire government service—the bureau which it is the desire of President Roosevelt shall serve as the example and inspiration for reform in methods throughout the Federal departments.

A man whose career-ledger can show a credit balance of such proportions, not only revolutionizes the popular conception of the public official genus, but also furnishes a human document that is in itself of striking interest. The incisive personality that can hew its way to success through the paralyzing inertia of government red tape and initiative-destroying precedent could easily have carved for itself a brilliant career in private enterprise and captured the aluring prizes of that fascinating strife.

Chose Career Of Hard Work.
In fact, the path of least resistance for young Pinchot when he made his deliberate choice of a career of hard work and high ideals during his last year at Yale, was a business life. He was urged to it by his grandfather, a man of great wealth and many large business enterprises, and in other ways the path was cleared for him and the steps made easy to success. With independent means of his own and a social position that left nothing to be desired, there was presented also the opportunity of a life of idleness and pleasure, varied with intermittent enthusiasms of the dilettante. But such a life had no attractions to the young student, nor did a business career appeal to him. Intensely democratic in his tastes and opinions, the most popular man in his class which showered honors upon him in recognition of unsought leadership, he was dominated by the idea of self-sacrificing civic duty, an ideal which, until the present time has received scanty recognition in the national consciousness, save in times of the country's peril and stress.

It was under such conditions that he made his choice of forestry as a life career, recognizing that the scientific application of its principles was rapidly becoming a vital national necessity. The criminal waste of the country's great forest resources, the crude methods of lumbering fostered by avarice and fraud that have reduced vast areas to desert land, have cost the country untold millions and constitute a disgraceful chapter in the nation's history. It is now an old story. But the old methods die hard, and that the pocket nerve of the lumber barons is still active is shown by continued bitter assaults upon the forest conservation policies of the government.

Following his graduation from Yale in 1889, Mr. Pinchot spent several years in the study of forestry in Germany and other parts of Europe. Returning to the United States he began the first practical and systematic forest work in the United States at Billmore, the great Vanderbilt property near Asheville, N. C., in 1892. In July, 1898, he became a member of the National Forestry Commission and later was made chief of the Federal division of forestry, now the forest service.

Has Withstood Powerful Assaults.
From modest beginnings the service has grown to enormous proportions, due to no small extent to Mr. Pinchot's unflagging zeal and untiring efforts and enthusiasm. It has withstood the assaults of some of the most powerful financial interests in the United States and has come out victorious from the combat. In the beginning it was the target of sneers and jeers. To-day the service commands the respect and has won the support of the great majority of the people of the country. It is acknowledged as the only solution of one of the nation's vital problems.

Such a victory against enormous odds makes the personality of the one who led the fight a national asset as a new type of public servant. It shows that there is a foothold for ambition in the Federal service and a chance for a career that is not based on and rooted in political activity. Many of Mr. Pinchot's friends attribute his success to his strong and dominating democratic tendencies. Born to the society purple, his natural inclinations early shattered the shackles of caste. At Yale his intimate associates were not among the exclusive wealthy set to which his own position gave him entree, but he picked his friends for their innate qualities. He had an insatiable curiosity to know men, and his judgments were quick and accurate. To this ability is due to no small extent his success in picking the right man for the right place and it has made the forestry service the model for esprit de corps and efficiency among the bureaus of the Federal government.

It is a common comment that social functions at Mr. Pinchot's residence in Washington are sui generis. There the Brahmin and the society "cave dweller" rub elbows with men and women often guileless of conventional evening dress, but who have won distinction and recognition by qualities of head and heart and are counted by Mr. Pinchot as his friends.

His Repugnance To Luxury.

His repugnance to mere luxury and vain display of wealth in the competition of idle extravagance is deep seated. It is a typical trait of the man and is explanatory of his democracy. His moral fiber revolts at the inequality of opportunities and enjoyments that modern social conditions create. Recently, in company with an intimate friend, in connection with a matter of business, he called at one of the great hotels patronized by millionaires. It was just after dinner, and the marble and gold corridors were filled with guests loitering in chairs or strolling about for the digestion hour. The very atmosphere was saturated with the glow of boastful wealth, the triumph of the baggy dollar. Fortunes in jewels blazed from the bosoms of women in gorgeous gowns, the every attitude of the saugly complacent men voiced the pretensions of social superiority. As Mr. Pinchot passed down the long corridor he said to his friend:

"A sight like this makes me almost a socialist. Look at these well-fed, well-groomed people, so self-satisfied. They think that they are superior to the rest of mankind, because the are able to pay abig price for their dinner."

Like all ambitious men, who have counted in achievement, Mr. Pinchot has the rare secret of complete self-sacrifice to his work. His entire life is ordered around the pole-star of forestry, and all other interests, even his friends and recreations, are subordinated sometimes to the point of elimination. An ardent sportsman, he has hunted and fished, in former days from Maine to Florida and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but he has little time for sport now, unless it serves as a medium to bring him in touch with and enables him to convert some hard-headed Westerner in need of light. The lure of good books, the fascinations of yachting, the pleasures of travel all are put aside and sacrificed to a clear cut, stern conviction of public duty.

Would Pay For National Debt.

Such in broad outline is the man who controls, under the government, a vast forest state, which under his management and largely by his initiative has grown to a valuation of a billion and a half dollars. Turned into cash the conserved forest resources of the country would pay the national debt and leave a fat surplus in the Treasury. Its valuation is far in excess of the total circulation of gold and silver in the United States and about equals the exports of merchandise. It is exceeded in valuation by only four States of the Union, New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and Ohio. In a recent interview, Mr. Pinchot declared that the estimated value of the production of timber and forage and the maintenance of stream flow through the use, protection and improvement of the national forests by the forest service is at least, $28,000,000 a year, or about 2 per cent upon total valuation, which is increasing under conservation policies at the rate of 10 per cent a year.

But the conservation of the nation's forests is not the only work of the forest
