A GREAT LOSS.

"So your car was stolen?"
"Yes."
"I would worry, perhaps it will be recovered."
"I'm not worrying about the car; that was insured. But I had six gallons of gasoline in the tank and I can't afford to stand that loss."
IT ISN'T THE CAR.

"Do you believe that music has a refining influence?"
"Oh, yes," replied the man of esthetic tastes, "but I do not see what uplift it has when a vaudeville performer plays a piano with his foot."

Lion Can be Just as Fickle as Any Man; Prince, With Ringling's Sorrowed for While, but Forgot

Ah, the fickleness of men and lions; us males are all alike. List to tale of Prince:

You should have known Prince in his prime before sorrow entered his life. There were those who would go into the Ringling Brothers' menagerie in the old days and stand for hours before his cage, worshipping. He came from Nubia, where he used to lord it over the African desert and frighten pith helmeted tourists out of their skins with his roaring. When the circus trapper caught him in a pit and he landed at the big show's winter quarters in Baraboo, Wis., then his natural royalty surged up and he used to shake the building and send his fellow critters into fits with his mighty voice. Oh, Prince was some roarer!

He had jaws that could almost have bitten a steel rail in two and a side-swipe that would have knocked a champion's block off. And as for lion-like manner! If he had been stuffed, you'd have said, "there ain't no such animal!"

Then grief came a knocking at his cage door. Nellie was his mate and for years they had loved and roared together in their suite of barred apartments, but last winter Nellie died. Prince was inconsolable. He lay on his back and gazed at the stars and his limp through the bars and moaned. One day when the circus opened its spring engagement at the coliseum in Chicago last April, a bunch of North-western university students came strolling by singing, "Oh, Nellie was a Lady—Last Night She Died." Tears streamed down Prince's face and he made a wet mop of his mane. He refused food. He entered upon a hunger strike against fate. Age was creeping on him—he was 17—and there was no more hope. One week he starved and moaned till he could hardly stand for weakness and his ribs showed pitifully through his shrunken hide. The Ringling Brothers' boss animal man, Charlie Smith, thought he would die. "Lions are like that," he said. "Grief kills them."

Two weeks ago, while the circus was playing a student of natural history, who had become interested in Prince, went out to the menagerie tent to study the case. To his astonishment he found the big fellow standing erect and roaring like a young volcano. His rheumy eye was bright again, his coat was turning glossy, his ribs disappeared. He gulped a hunk of meat, then pranced and even galloped around his cage.

"What happened to Prince?" asked the student. "I thought I was coming to attend a funeral, but it looks more like a wedding." "Right-o!" answered Boss Smith. "See that coy young lioness in the second cage over yonder? She came a few days ago and Prince has taken to his ten pounds of beefsteak regular ever since. Look how the old boy is laming her!"

And that's how it was. And that's how it undoubtedly will be when Prince and the Ringling circus comes to Grand Forks to exhibit next Monday.

HOW RED TAPE CAN BE OUT.

London Newspaper Prints an Interesting War Time Story.

London, July 19.—The leisurely manner in which red tape is unwound in war times is illustrated by an incident described in the Evening Standard.

"In January last," the newspaper says, "a certain neutral Government bought a small machine. It contained a very small quantity of a certain metal, the export of which was prohibited unless a permit could be obtained.

"The Minister representing the country concerned applied for a permit. The application went first to the Foreign Office. From the Foreign Office it was sent upon its travels round Whitehall, ultimately reaching the person who could give the permit on June 21.

"The permit started on its return journey on June 22. When it will arrive at the office of the Minister who made the application no one can tell.
