ADAMSON BILL A FAVORABLE SETTLEMENT

Today, Senator Newlands referred to the legislative suggestions made by the president, and said the enlargement of the Interstate Commerce Commission would not be pressed because of serious opposition to that time. The proposal for investigation as to the necessity for increased freight rates, the committee did not comply with, he explained, because it thought that the Interstate Commerce Commission already had power to adjust rates and it would be its duty to take into consideration all new facts affecting them.

"Regarding important legislation to prevent future labor crises," said Senator Newlands, "the committee could not report today. Whether it will be reported in the future remains for the committee to determine. The same is true also of the suggestion for a bill authorizing the president to appoint military purposes."

Senator Cummins asked if the provision imposing a penalty for obstructing movements of trains would apply merely to physical obstructions or would affect employees who refused to move trains. Senator Newlands said the point had not been considered; that the purpose was to keep the roads open. Senator Cummins suggested that it might be construed to deny a man the right to strike and would therefore be unconstitutional.

The first criticism of the committee's work came from Senator Reed who wanted to know if the section directed against strikes and that of the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix the wages of railroad employees had been suggested by President Wilson. He stated that one would deprive the worker of his right to contract for his own pay and subject him to "involuntary servitude" and the other render him liable to imprisonment for some slight offense. Senator Newlands said the two provisions had been inserted without suggestions by the president.

"I believe in government of law and order," he added, "and not in a government of force where an individual organization can apply force and demand submission."

"To drag into this bill matters of most serious concern that are not necessary to meet the emergency," said Senator Reed, "will provoke bitterness of debate, prolong discussion and defeat the passage of the measure in time to prevent the catastrophe impending. There are suggestions here that are absolutely revolutionary. At this crisis, with the house burning down before our very eyes, the senator from Nevada wants us to stop and reform all creation."

"When you lay before the railroad employees of the country provisions, which properly construed, would take away their right of individual contract, you will arouse such feelings of such consternation, such indignation that instead of stopping the strike you will absolutely force it. Why not reform all creation?"

Senator Underwood said the legislation was not to insure an eight-hour day for the railroad employees, but to give them a 25 per cent wage increase, which the labor men say is right and the railroads say is destructive. "The people of the United States are threatened with a debacle not equalled except in the great war," he declared. "Starvation, business paralysis and war stare the people in the face. For one I am willing to surrender my individual judgment and vote for this legislation without knowledge of the facts to bring peace."

"In his suggestion for compulsory arbitration, the president was right. If you only want to settle this controversy in the interest of one side, organized labor, pass the eight-hour bill. But there will be no strike no matter what you put in this bill, and why should we say to the public now that we will settle this thing but in six months you will have to face the danger again. Give the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to fix wages and hours and no such crisis can again arise in this country."

Pittman Objected. Senator Pittman objected to the statement that President Wilson favored a compulsory arbitration bill. Senator Underwood insisted that the bill had before the Interstate Commerce Committee had been presented by an assistant attorney general and a member of the United States board of mediation and conciliation.

Senator Newlands said the president had seen the section giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to regulate wages. Senator Underwood declared that the proviso giving the commission authority over wages broadened the wage scale to 800,000 men instead of confining it to 400,000.

This provides a permanent board of arbitration in this country for railroad employees," he said. "It affords an opportunity for its day in labor. In future it will not have to go with mailed fist to demand its right."

Objection to any action other than the eight-hour legislation was voiced by Senator Simmons, who said he thought passage of the bill with the Interstate Commerce Committee wage fixing provision might lead to a strike and passage without it would certainly avert one.

"These labor men," said Senator Underwood in reply, "are men of intelligence and character and high standing. They might protest and seek to hold you and me responsible, but to say they would go and declare a strike because of this law is an indictment of their integrity and intelligence. The strike is off today."

CORN CROP IS UNUSUALLY GOOD

Experts Return From Tour of Investigation Throughout the County.

Edgar I. Olsen, field agent for the Grand Forks county Better Farming association and J. G. Haney, manager of the International Harvester company's experimental farm, have returned from an inspection of the corn crops throughout the county. According to the experts, the corn this year is unusually good. The best field was found on the J. W. Scott farm near Gilby, where every stalk is an ideal specimen.

The corn is practically matured already dented and glazed and will be ready for harvesting within the next ten days. The yield will be unusually large and as the product is of excellent quality, it is claimed that the profits will be large.

Last year the corn was poor and the yield light but enough was obtained for seed. The corn on the Scott farm is of the Minnesota 23 variety and is grown from seed grown locally for the past four years. The results show the importance of home grown seed. claim the experts who are enthusiastic over the conditions that exist.

The corn fields cared for by the boys in the acre yield contest are also in excellent condition and the competition will be keen. The seed for these fields was furnished by J. D. Bacon from corn grown on the Lilaic Hedge farm.
