Banking on the Barn.
We grant that boyhood's dreaming puts a halo round the place. For boys and barns run harnessed to the whole big human race. But deeper than the romance of those golden yesterdays, Are thoughts of work and profit in a hundred farmer-ways. It stands there through the seasons like a sort of treasure chest, Stuffed full of garnered earnings of the clearest and the best. And life's great magic secret of the seed and of the soil.

Lies just beyond its portals, as our recompense for toil. Old barn, you house ambition, and th' hopes of fortunes; The very gates of happiness are th' doors of you, I guess.

Man till his little acres and he cuts his little grain. But when he starts to saving is he on his way to gain. The sun may do its duty and the showers and the earth. And all God's farming chalice prove th' wonder of its worth. But you, you know, your portion is to save against the storm. And make the days of plowin' take money-clinking form.

You bulge with grain a-plenty, you are corpulent and quaint; You face the sunlit valley in a nice new coat of paint.

Your hay-lofts stream with yellow (up there, twenty years ago) I read my Injun stories, steeped in timothy, I know, complimentary. Your bins are filled to brimmin'—nothing better in the land. Each nook and cranny answers to the hungriest demand. Th' good Lord watches over and protects you, for us all. 'Till other crops are gathered to another season's call.

—W. Livingston Larned.
