SPEAKER URGES PURE LANGUAGE

Prof. George P. Jackson Gives Fine Address Before Fortnightly Club.

"Our Language, Its Weakness and Its Strength" was ably discussed at the meeting of the Fortnightly club last evening by Prof. George P. Jackson of the university. Prof. Jackson brought out the fact that at one time the English language, or the Anglo-Saxon, was a pure language. It has become a mixture of many languages and is simply a collection of them all. The speaker took issue with those who say that the acquiring of words from other languages is a boon to English. He said that its influence was directly opposed to the American principle of democracy. Big words, which were hard to learn and that they were stumbling blocks in the paths of young learners. The lecture closed with a plea to the audience to foster a patriotic desire to keep our language pure, to make it one of greater beauty and strength and one that would spread by its real worth.

Gleanings

WHO KNOWS THEIR WAYS.

A queer, hot shame flooded her. Somehow, as she had been standing there, she had imagined him doing something else in thanking her, something more in keeping with his romantic career. She was in love with him, she knew, and in her fancy she had seen him stretch both arms about her in thanks and love, and had seen them together up-anchor and away on that star-gazing quest of his for Bimini. And then suddenly to be confronted with this shy, embarrassed manner and thanked in these conventional words! It made her suddenly coldly angry. Perhaps, she said to herself, he was ashamed to have been helped by a woman!

DIDN'T FEEL HIM.

"Bang!" went the rifle at the maneuver. "Oo-oo!" screamed the pretty girl—a nice, decorous, surprised little scream. She stepped backward into the arms of a young man.

"Oh!" she said, blushing. "I was frightened by the rifles. I beg your pardon."

"Not at all," said the young man. "Let's go over and watch the artillery."
