

A PETITION.

My little grandson three years old sleeps by my bedside nightly. Through the long hours of dark and cold, dreaming, he slumbers lightly. He feels my arm around him fold and in his heart reposes, upon his hair a gleam of gold, his cheeks like damask roses.

A MAN'S HONOR.

Wyndam leaned back in his chair, regarding the salted flames of the grate fire with hostile eyes. He believed himself to be particularly calm—his heart was beating at its normal, placid pace, his mind was clear. He was unaware that his fingers were nervously tapping the arms of his chair, and that his view of the fire was gradually growing blurred and indistinct.

He pressed to his heart, hoping that death would not be long delayed, for the pain he was suffering was intense. He could feel the warm blood trickling over his hand, dyeing the bosom of his shirt a vivid red.

His eyes fell upon his trembling hand, which still clutched the pistol. It was not smoking, and suddenly there echoed in Wyndam's ear the dull fall of the hammer. He realized that he was not shot; that the pistol had been unloaded.

The mirror, which he faced, unmercifully reflected him. The color had fled from his face; his eyes were fixed and distended; his lips were twitching. He gave some contemptuous commiseration to the subject figure, failing to realize immediately that it was himself.

The weapon dropped from his nerveless fingers, and he buried his face in his hands. He continued to sit in his huddled position for some time, then, after several fruitless attempts, got to his feet. He groped his way blindly to the cartridges, and when he at last had the box in his hand slowly retraced his steps to the pistol, which lay upon the floor.

He carefully smoothed the anguish from his face, and once again bent for the revolver. This time he was able to control his hand, but he could not pick it up. He had lost control of his fingers. He drew himself erect and wiped away the cold perspiration which had broken out on his brow.

"Great God," he whispered, "what a coward I am!" He carefully smoothed the anguish from his face, and once again bent for the revolver. This time he was able to control his hand, but he could not pick it up.

He seemed to derive a certain satisfaction from the work. "How is it so summarily deciding that only through our death could restitution be made?" he demanded. "Howard would be far more content if left with his books and a modest competency. The control of vast wealth would be nothing but a burden to him.

It had grown late, and he carefully dressed for dinner. Once or twice his thoughts hovered over the motionless form lying in his brother's room. It would be necessary for him to feign surprise when the servants found the body, but he impressed upon himself the fact that he must be cautious not to overact his role.

He had dressed without his valet's help, but as he was about to leave the room he heard him in the corridor. He advanced toward the door, smiling a little, as if pleased at having got along without the man's assistance.

He opened the door, then retreated a step, as if also the man on the threshold. The two brothers, both carefully dressed, stood face to face—Alice S. Wolf in Argonaut.

He debated with himself for some moments over the advisability of leaving a few last words to the woman who was to have been his wife, but ultimately dismissed the thought asavoring of the dramatic. In fact, he felt he could derive no consolation from writing to her, as he could frame no possible excuse for his impending action.

No North, No South. The debate on the question whether the south is worse than the north or the north is as bad as the south in the matter of lynching criminals is neither edifying nor profitable.

It makes not a particle of difference whether the mob in Michigan which burned a white woman was more malevolent than the Texas mob which roasted a negro. They were both mobs, and they both committed an act which is a disgrace to nineteenth century civilization.

We have a system of justice, and the forms prescribed for it should be rigidly followed in all sections of the Union. There are delays in the administration of the law which are sometimes exasperating, but their tendency is in the right direction—namely, to give the accused every possible opportunity to prove his innocence.

Mr. Cleveland has, it appears, gathered into his cabinet an unusual number of fishermen. The fondness of the president for angling is well known. Last summer he wore his old clothes and fished in Buzzard's bay without much attention to the campaign.

A cool spring has greatly interfered with the selling of reasonable goods. Shoppers are not inclined to buy freely of cottons and summer silks when many are still wearing furs and heavy flannels.

The best roads in the world are those to be found in Ireland. They are far superior to those in England or in Germany. Tourists from every country pronounce them unrivaled.

As he was about to pull the trigger he heard indistinctly the muffled report of the pistol which had been fired in a room further down the corridor. The sound hastened him, and he at once pulled the trigger.
