Indications. Forecast for Southern California: Fair with a slight possibility of showers in western portion...

Mr. C. Galpin will please call at this office at 1:30 p. m. today. The young Temple-street ball players defeated the Victor Heights yesterday by a score of 6 to 2.

Peter Rasmussen was arrested by Officer Madden yesterday on a charge of violating the park ordinance, by distributing advertising bills in Westlake park.

At theosophical headquarters last evening Mr. F. Neubauer addressed the audience upon the subject of Reality and Illusion, wherein he set forth that which we commonly regard as being permanent or real, is in truth of the most transitory and illusory nature because of its changeability.

In Olden Times. People overlooked the importance of permanently beneficial effects and were satisfied with transient action, but now that it is generally known that Syrup of Figs will permanently cure habitual constipation, well-informed people will not buy other laxatives, which act for a time, but finally injure the system.

For Santa Catalina Island. Steamer sails from San Pedro every Saturday, connecting with morning trains from Los Angeles; returning Monday following. Wilmington Trans. Co., 130 W. Second st.

$15 Reward. Off & Vaughn, druggists, corner Fourth and Spring streets, are authorized to refund the above in any case that a single bottle of Smith's Hand and Footed fails to cure. Never known to fail. Try it.

THE OBJECT OF STAGE ROBBERS. A Coach That Was Held Up Eighty-three Times. Eight Drivers and as Many Express Messengers Killed on It.

The Great Fight in Which It Played a Part Between Tombstone and Tucson, Ariz.

There is today in Phoenix, Ariz., a stage coach that has been held up and robbed often than any other in existence. It has seen its best days and now stands dismantled and dilapidated in the back yard of a livery stable, but could it but talk many are the tales it could tell of brigandage that would lay the exploits of Claude Duval in their shadow.

It began running in the seventies between Prescott and Tombstone, and has actually been robbed 83 times. Eight drivers and as many express messengers have been killed from its box, and as passengers in those days went around to defend themselves and property, not a few fatalities have occurred among them and the brigands.

It was originally a handsome Concord coach, pulled by eight mules, and cost $1800. The sides are now split by rifle and pistol bullets, and in more than one place the leather lining shows the wild stroke of a bowie knife.

One of the fights in which it played a part, and which resulted most disastrously to the robbers, occurred between Tucson and Tombstone in 1884. The present United States marshal of the district of Arizona, R. H. Paul, a man of acknowledged bravery, was the messenger of Wells-Fargo company aboard at the time. Stage coaches at that time, now, carried a pretty good arsenal. Shotguns, rifles and pistols hung to holsters everywhere it was possible to put them, so that in the event the passengers were unarmed they would still be able to defend themselves against either robbers or Indians.

It was often the case that when there was a full load of passengers, or the express messenger was known to be a man of courage, the bandits would make themselves known by killing the messenger and firing a volley into the coach.

Paul had been engaged in several of these frontier episodes, in all of which the robbers had come out second best, and on this occasion they planned wild murder.

When the stage arrived at Fairbanks, one of the passengers insisted on everybody taking a drink. The messenger never refused a drink; consequently, while the change of horses was being made, they all filled in and partook of the stranger's hospitality.

The bartender was confederate, and every glass was dragged, but Paul made it a point never to drink while on his run, and to prevent being churlish threw his glass upon the floor without being noticed. When the stage started the hospitable stranger remained behind.

While passing the mouth of a dreary cañon about three miles farther on, the usual command of "halt" was given from cover, and upon its being disregarded a bullet was fired at the head of the driver, but missed its aim.

Frightened and in a panic, the mules broke into a dead run. With its swaying and rocking the stage struck a boulder and came near upsetting. The jolt threw Paul several inches upward in the seat and saved his life, for at that instant a robber on his side fired a shot into the cañon.

The bullet passed under Paul and instantly killed the driver who was sitting beside him.

The express matter contained $20,000 in bullion that was being sent from the mines, and a special guard a corporal and four soldiers had been dispatched to occupy places on the outside of the coach. The messenger expected every instant to hear them open fire, but they had drunk of the poisoned potion along with the other passengers and were lying inside in a deathlike stupor. Not liking the idea of giving up the wealth, Paul began shooting at all the robbers in sight.

His first shot killed the fellow who killed the driver, and with his next he put a bullet through another's body. The robbers had fallen out of the hands of the dead driver, and all this time the team was running at full speed, so that in a short time they were away from the scene of the fighting, and the messenger, climbing out on the tongue, succeeded in stopping the runaway. A few miles further they came to a rancheria. The soldiers and passengers having recovered, Paul secured other assistance, and putting the stage in charge of another messenger, returned to the scene of the conflict to bury the dead and make a possible capture of the surviving robbers.

It was found that when Paul's shotgun and Winchester began doing such execution the highwaymen had fled, leaving both their dead and wounded comrades on the ground.

The wounded man had succeeded in reaching his horse and climbing on, had ridden away up the cañon. Every step was marked with blood, and the pursuers expected to find his dead body at every turn; but after traveling nearly all day they had not come upon him. Near sundown they found his horse loose and wandering through the mesquitos. Thinking that he must be lying dead among the rocks, they dismounted and began a diligent search. Paul started up a little cañon overlooked by a high hill. He had not walked 20 feet till a ball from the desperado's rifle struck him in the shoulder. Falling behind a rock, a duel to the death began between them, though the robber's exposed position gave Paul the advantage, and with the third shot he succeeded in shooting him through the head.

It was found that in the fight at the coach the fellow had been shot through the breast with a Winchester ball, making a necessarily fatal wound, but by superhuman effort he had dragged himself to his horse and ridden the remainder of the day. Becoming so weak from pain, loss of blood and thirst, he had dismounted, loose, and climbing to a point where he could get a good view of the surrounding country, had lain down to die, with the hope that before death reached him he would be able to avenge himself on his pursuers and the man who gave him his mortal wound.

His extreme weakness was the only thing that saved the messenger's life for an inch lower and the ball would have cut the cavity of the heart.

The dead man was the leader of the band and the one who bought the poisoned whiskey in the morning. Knowing that if the remainder of the band were not captured it would only be a question of time till they killed him, Paul procured leave of absence and began hunting them down. After an arduous search they were overtaken in the state of Chihuahua, Mexico. They took refuge in a house and, being three in number, withstood all attempts to capture them, but finally the pursuers succeeded in setting fire to the building and they were roasted like rats.

A year later the coach was robbed its last time. At the first volley the driver and messenger were both killed, and the frightened horses broke into a run. The bandits then fired a volley into the coach, literally riddling it with bullets and killing the only two passengers.

At the moment of his death the messenger was holding the box, and it fell off with him, so the robbers pursued the coach no farther.

When the team came thundering into Phoenix the reins were held in the stiffening fingers of a corpse, while the two dead men inside lay bloody and ghastly, still clutching the revolvers that had availed them nothing.

The old coach was run in the yard and never went out again, and today the crushed seats, protected by the roof, show the bloodstains of her last passengers.

Where the Credit Belongs. It is the Southern California Improvement company which is constructing the mammoth irrigation system to reclaim a large area of at present desert land east of Daggoit. The work was commenced about two years ago by the Silver Valley Land and Water company, but they were obliged to abandon the project for want of funds after spending over $40,000 in preliminary work, but through the efforts of Mr. E. S. Hubbard of the Illinois Accumulative Investment company, their interest was sold to the syndicate having the work in hand at present. The Santa Fe Railway company is not financially interested in the undertaking.
