So persistently has the man been followed by ill luck that within a year and a half he has been reduced from the position of a sober and self-respecting painter to the rank of a common mendicant.

About a year and a half ago Cole fell from the third step of a stepladder upon which he was working. The fall in itself did not amount to much, but the man struck in such a manner that he fractured a vertebrae.

DISPERSE WITH WOMEN TRY THEIR OWN CASE IN COURTS

Justice Young Has a Weary Time Listening to Wrangle Over Suit. Logic of the Contestants Startles the Court

Armed with legal documents galore, which they did not understand, and addressing the judge on subjects of law in a manner which he failed to appreciate, Mrs. Florence G. Falkner and Mrs. Mary McPhessen, Los Angeles dressmakers, neither of whom had ever before been in a court room, yesterday undertook the trial, without aid of attorneys, of a suit for debt brought by the one against the other before Justice Young of the township court.

The case has been continued for some time past by Justice Young in the hope that the women might settle their difficulties without carrying the argument into legal circles, for the justice had his ideas about a woman's argument relative to law and he feared the meeting.

Yesterday Mrs. Falkner, the plaintiff, appeared in court and announced herself ready to proceed. The case was continued until after the Bench hearing had terminated and then the plaintiff, after counting out the three-dollar trial fee with great care, proceeded to march to the attorneys' table, while Justice Young, with a last despairing glance for a chance to escape, wearily mounted the bench and began the trial.

Deals Out Double Negative Mrs. Falkner was the first to be sworn and as soon as she took the witness stand she began a long statement of her personal dealings with Mrs. McPhessen, while the justice looked on in awe and occasionally attempted to interrupt by such exclamations as "Excuse me, excuse me, madam, but that evidence is immaterial," but Mrs. Falkner paid no heed and the court listened in silence to the oration.

A bunch of bills, made out by Mrs. McPhessen, were then produced and Mrs. Falkner started to read them. The justice interrupted with the suggestion that according to the rules of law the defendant might see the papers before they were introduced as evidence.

Mrs. McPhessen marched forward, looked at the papers and when asked if she objected to the papers, nodded her head and stated: "I don't owe her no money."

Fifteen minutes were again taken up before the justice straightened out the tangle and by explanation and innuendo managed to have the papers admitted as evidence.

The two women had met in Los Angeles and had planned to go to Seattle and there open an establishment. When they got as far as San Francisco Mrs. McPhessen alleges she borrowed $24 from Mrs. Falkner, giving a pawn ticket for $338, loaned on diamonds, as security.

Mrs. Falkner had an itemized account of railroad fare, meals, such as breakfast, supper and an occasional lunch, room rent, and other expenses, and in addition the interest on the loan, figured out to a nicety, and the costs of the suit.

Justice in Despair The latter had to be stricken from the roll under protest. Then the women argued the case in a manner so thoroughly feminine that the justice fairly gasped in an attempt to understand the line of argument.

One long statement would be made only to be refuted by the single sentence: "I did not."

When the justice would ask the reason the indignant reply would be: "Just because."

After the reasoning had gone on for two hours the justice in a wave of despair settled the suit by giving the plaintiff damages for $38.36 and costs. The defendant's reply was that she would pay when she got ready, and she left the court room.

The plaintiff asked where she could get the money and what good that judgment business was going to do her, and the justice, after begging and talking, was discontinued, suggested that she swear out an attachment on judgment.

This Mrs. Falkner did not understand, but paid the costs without a murmur, living in hope.

As for Justice Young, he cast one glance after the departing figures of the attorneys and then with a sigh of relief began to read the latest pamphlet on anti-woman suffrage.
