SPENCER'S "FRIEND."

Spilner On the Witness Stand.

SAYS HE SHOT IN AIR

With No Animus Towards Spencer He Condemns Him in Black and White.

Tanaka, the Japanese luno, and Captain Spilner were on the witness stand yesterday in the police court in the preliminary examination of the Spencer case. The case went on all day and will probably occupy the court until the middle of next week. Tanaka didn't seem to know very well what position he occupied on Laysan Island at the time of Spencer's arrival on the Ceylon. Before Captain Spilner returned, Spilner was boss and Tanaka was luno; on Spencer's arrival Spilner became luno since Spencer was the boss and Tanaka didn't know where he was—at least he testified to that effect yesterday. It took twenty or thirty pretty sharp questions by Attorney Kinney, on cross examination, to get the witness to admit that after Spencer arrived, for the two or three days before the shooting affair, he was acting as a common laborer.

FORGOT LITTLE THINGS.

"On Saturday, August 11, the day of the shooting, did you go to Captain Spencer's house and tell the house-boy that he must not work any more; that he must come with you?" "I don't know if I did. I don't remember little things like that." "Did Spilner shoot from the platform on Saturday night?" "I don't remember. I think all the white men shot." "Did Spilner have a gun?" "Yes." "Then he shot, too?" "Yes." "You and Spilner were good friends?" "Yes." "Didn't you ask him after all the shooting was over, the next day, why he shot at the Japanese?" "No." "Did Spencer's son fire?" "He fired the first shot." "Didn't you want to be very friendly with the white men after the shooting? Were you not afraid of the other Japanese?" "No such thing." "Is it not a fact that Captain Spencer went to your house and drove away some Japanese who were with you, wanting to protect you against them?" "No." "He didn't go there to fulfill a pledge he had made to you to protect you against the rest of the Japanese?" "I don't know." "Were you friendly with the Captain on Saturday?" "I only went to see him about rice for the Japanese." "Didn't you warn him that the Japanese were going to tear down his house and make him, Captain Spencer, sore?" "No." "Did you speak to Mrs. Spencer that Saturday, in the morning?" "No." "You didn't tell her about any trouble that might be expected?" "No." "Did the Japanese who had been working aboard finally abandon their claims for extra pay?" "I don't know." "Is it not a fact that Spilner and yourself put your heads together to raise a rumpus upon Captain Spencer's arrival?" "No such thing." "Chillingworth then questioned the witness for a few moments on two or three important points. "How many Japanese were there on the steps of the platform just behind the five who went up on the platform on Saturday night?" "About half the gang." "Before the shooting?" "When the guns were pointed there were seven or eight Japanese on the platform, the rest were on the steps and on the ground." "How many were there on the ground?" "A quarter of them were on the ground, the rest on the steps and the platform."

SPILNER ON THE STAND.

Captain Spilner was the next witness for the prosecution. In answer to High Sheriff Brown's questions, on direct examination he testified that he had left Honolulu, on April 27 for Laysan Island on the ill-fated bark McNear. There were nineteen Japanese laborers aboard for Laysan Island. Spilner went on to tell of the wreck of the McNear on Dowsett reef, of the taking to the boats, and finally arriving at Laysan Island and other matters in this connection.

MIGHT CONVICT HIMSELF.

Here Attorney Kinney jumped to his feet to take exception just as the High Sheriff was about to touch on subjects more nearly connected with the events of the day of the shooting.

"Before we proceed any further," said Kinney, "we would like to know the position in which the witness is placed as far as the government is concerned. If he is under arrest or if he is likely to be arrested. Whether he has been promised immunity from prosecution in case his testimony is satisfactory to the government or whether he comes onto the stand practically in irons to testify very possibly against himself? Is there any good reason for this man being free while Captain Spilner has a charge of murder in the first degree hanging over his head? I ask for information. I want to be enlightened on this subject. Is it fair, I say, to put this man Spilner on the stand as a witness against Spencer when the testimony he may give may prove Spilner himself guilty of murder? It is not fair to the witness. The Japanese who have already testified have sworn that Spilner fired with the rest of the white men. Spilner's testimony may hang him."

HOW A HYPNOTIST GOT JUDGE WILCOX TO ADJOURN COURT

The man with the hypnotic eye is with us. His name is Green, he has but one arm and his business is to collect bills. That he knows his business various facts attest. Yesterday Green walked calmly into the District Court and fixed a concentrated gaze on Judge Wilcox. He stood a minute and then sat down, apparently with the same determination shown by Mark Twain's undertaker who roosted on the doorstep of the house where a man was dying, intent on getting the remains. Judge Wilcox raved fixedly at Green, fussed, tried to look away, couldn't, and then abruptly adjourned court in which the Laysan Island shooting case was progressing. Green still looked at the Judge steadily and seemed to have perfect control of his actions. His Honor mechanically turned to an officer, told him to escort Green to his private room and disappeared with the hypnotist. Five minutes, ten minutes passed and the plunk of gold coins was heard in the Judge's chambers. Lawyers and auditors looked at each other with wide smiles. "Gee whiz, but he's making Wilcox pungle," said one. "Get out," said another, "Green's been collecting money for him." "Taint that," remarked an old enemy confidently, "they're in there playing poker." Then the door suddenly opened and His Honor mounted the bench in a dazed way. Green backed towards the stairway, made a half-pass in the air and the Judge said sharply: "Proceed gentlemen."

"I saw no one rushing on the old man, so I didn't want to hurt anybody." "Who fired the first two shots?" "Captain Spencer." "Did you see anybody fall?" "Yes, I saw a Japanese fall." "How many shots were fired?" "I don't know. We all shot, and then Spencer said, 'Stop firing.'" Spilner then went into details about how he nursed the wounded after the shooting.

SPILNER'S STORY.

Direct examination was resumed after Kinney's exception had been filed. Spilner's story, as brought out by the questions of High Sheriff Brown, was, in brief, as follows: On Saturday, August 11, the day of the shooting, the Japanese laborers started to work at 6 o'clock in the morning. Some went to the guano house while the nine men, who were to work aboard, sat around on the wharf. Captain Spencer came down to the wharf about fifteen minutes later and asked why the men were not at work. The men wanted some arrangements made whereby they would receive extra pay for working aboard; they already got extra pay for this but wanted still more. Captain Spencer's son told the men that if they were not going to work they had better go home; so they all went home. This is according to Spilner's testimony. Spilner then went to the carpenter's shop and had a talk with him, then he went to Captain Spencer's house. Spencer asked Spilner why the men had struck and Spilner told him that his son had sent them all home.

TESTIFIES TO THREATS.

While in his room, so Spilner testified, Tanaka, the luno, went to him and told him that trouble was coming. "All the Japanese are coming tonight to break Captain Spencer's house and make him sore," said Tanaka. "Nobody was working on that day except Spilner. He worked a couple of hours with the sailors of the Ceylon on a lighter in the morning. Spilner then remembered that Tanaka worked a little, too. After Tanaka had warned Spilner of the threats of the Japanese, Spilner went to Spencer's house and told the captain what Tanaka had said about the Japanese going to 'break his house and make him sore.' 'Let them come,' said Spilner. Then Spilner went to the engineer's house and had a talk with him, and they both went back to Captain Spencer's house, where they remained the rest of the day. Captain Willer of the bark Ceylon had come ashore and left two revolvers with Captain Spencer. The engineer took one of these and Spencer's son took the other.

SAYS HE SHOT IN THE AIR.

According to Spilner's testimony the Japanese and the white men were in the evening about 6 o'clock, in a body. The white men walked to the platform from Spencer's house. Tanaka went from his room onto the platform. Spilner said that four Japanese could come on the platform to talk over matters, but that he would not let anybody else come. Tanaka interpreted the wishes of the Japanese concerning rice to Captain Spencer. Four Japanese had come up on the platform. They talked first about rice and then asked for two and one-half days' extra pay. This the captain at first refused, and then agreed to. After Spencer had agreed to two and one-half days extra day the men demanded three days extra pay. This the captain refused.

"I saw no one rushing on the old man, so I didn't want to hurt anybody." "Who fired the first two shots?" "Captain Spencer." "Did you see anybody fall?" "Yes, I saw a Japanese fall." "How many shots were fired?" "I don't know. We all shot, and then Spencer said, 'Stop firing.'" Spilner then went into details about how he nursed the wounded after the shooting.

CAPTAIN SPENCER'S "FRIEND."

When the defence commenced to examine the witness there was a little bustle of excitement among the spectators. Many of the crew of the bark Ceylon, including the mate were present and they craned their necks to allow their ears to catch every word. It was indeed an interesting cross-examination and several times it was necessary for the court officer to rap on his gavel for order, so frequent were the audible smiles indulged in as the clever defending lawyer handled the witness for the prosecution.

First Spilner was asked if he had any ill-will, grudge, bad-feeling, or animus against Captain Spencer. Spilner declared that he had not and swore that he had always been Spencer's firm friend and was his friend now.

Kinney produced a letter written by Spilner from Laysan Island after Captain Spencer had left. The letter was addressed to Dr. Averdam, manager of the Pacific Guano and Fertilizer Company; and was written in German. An English translation was also in the possession of the attorney. He handed Spilner the original and, reading from the type-written translation, asked Spilner to follow him and see if the translation was correct. Spilner did as he was told and swore that the translation was correct.

The letter which Spilner wrote to Averdam, after describing the wreck of the island at the time and various other matters, goes on to speak of Captain Spencer as a drunkard, a man incapable of discharging his duties as manager of Laysan Island, a man who was altogether too easy with the Japanese, one who was losing money daily for the company and a man who treated the Japanese better than he did the Germans on the island. The Germans are Spilner, the engineer and the carpenter. After telling Dr. Averdam, in a "friendly" spirit, all these things against the captain, Spilner, in his letter, intimates that he, Spilner, is thoroughly capable of taking care of matters on the island himself and that, in the event of Captain Spencer not returning, he would like to have his wife go down to the island. If Spencer was coming back, however, he didn't want his wife to join him.

"Is that the kind of a letter a 'friend' would write?" asked Kinney. "Why? yes. It is the truth. I am his friend, too."

AVERDAM'S REPLY.

"Have you the letter which Dr. Averdam sent you in reply to this?" "Yes! Here it is."

Kinney read aloud. It advised Spilner to try and gain the confidence of Captain Spencer, to remember that he was only a luno on Laysan Island and that it was not his business to criticize or interfere with his superiors. For about thirty minutes after this Kinney kept up a rapid fire of pertinent questions. The witness frequently contradicted himself and showed by his testimony notwithstanding his assertion concerning "friendship," that he entertained considerable animus against the prisoner. He repeated on cross-examination that Tanaka had warned him of the threats of the Japanese, swore that he fired the shots from his revolver in the air and, admitting that Captain Spencer was a kind and brave man, said that he, too, was a brave man. He objected strenuously to Spilner having on several occasions given Tanaka a drink of whiskey in the morning before work when he, Spilner, received none. He said he understood when he went down to Laysan Island that there was plenty of liquor there. Incidentally, he had said in his letter to Averdam that there was altogether too much drinking on the island. He said that Spencer had liked him, trusted him and treated him well—with the exception of not "treating" him to whisky as he did Tanaka.
