LATE JAMES DODD'S DIAMOND.

SOMETHING ABOUT ITS BRILLIANT
CY AND SPARKLE.

The Widow Claims It Belongs to Her,
While the Estate Claims It as
Its Own.

Among the personal effects left by the late James Dodd was a diamond stud. It was a solitaire stud, which sparkled and glistened, and glistened and sparkled like a raindrop in the tropical sun.

Now, the late James Dodd personally didn't go much on diamonds. His shirt bosom was unadorned with jewels and his hands were calloused with the handling of a certain brand of beer in kegs and in bottles. The late Jim Dodd, most estimable man as he was in many regards, was not a fashion-plate. But he believed in seeing those whom he loved properly attired and bejeweled.

Among the effects that he left his wife, aside from a parrot, was the solitaire stud which sheds its radiance on this tale. Mrs. Dodd contends that this ring was given her prior to the death of her husband, and that it belongs to her and her alone.

The administrator of the estate, Robert W. Cathcart, sets up a counter claim. He asserts that the solitaire diamond, with all of its bewildering prismatic effects, belongs to the estate. Hardly had the late Mr. Dodd been laid to eternal rest before the vigilant Cathcart, according to the widow's story, seized the precious stone, and legal warfare has ensued.

Yesterday Kinney, Ballou & McClanahan, attorneys for Rebecca Dodd, moved that an order be entered requiring Robert W. Cathcart, executor of the will of James Dodd, deceased, to deliver her one diamond stud, the property of Rebecca Dodd, now in possession of said Robert W. Cathcart. The motion is based upon testimony already taken in the case.
