NO. 40

Night in a City Hospital.

I went the other night to see an old friend who was dying in one of our great hospitals. His messenger came to me late, and midnight was at hand when we rang the bell in the black cavern of a doorway—a bell with a deep, serious tone, that sounded most appropriately like a knell. The deserted corridors were lighted with thin flames of gas, that flickered as if afraid of the shadows, and the echoes of the tiled floors were startlingly intense under our hurrying feet. In a dark corner of every floor a watchman sat, wakeful and as silent as a phantom. Through a closed door as we passed, came a muffled cry, but otherwise no human noise troubled our progress, save those created by ourselves. Well up toward the roof my guide opened a door, and we were in one of the common wards, at the further end of which was the private room of the man we were visiting. The lights were down, and wandering moonbeams streaked the floor through the long, latticed shutters of the tall windows. On either hand the row of cots went down the walls. The room was so lofty that its dim ceiling was scarcely visible in the subdued light, and so spacious that the vast, polished floor was like a black pool into which we had to wade at unknown depths.

The moment the door opened, a simultaneous movement, like a shudder, ran through the lines of cots. Every man in them had been roused from his light sleep by our almost noiseless entrance, and in the vague gloom we went as softly as we could between two lines of burning eyes. There was no sound, no breath, no sigh, though there were cruelly mangled and tortured bodies all around us. Only those hot, piercing eyes, fixed on us with what fierce envy and devouring yearning of our own health and freedom was not difficult to imagine. It gave me a cold shudder, just as when, lying by a Texan camp-fire, I had shuddered at the lambent eyes of the coyotes that circled us in a greedy and cowardly ring.—New York News "Babbie."

Vegetable Growth of Southern California.

It was very difficult for me, when I first came to the coast, to realize the rapidity of the growth of vegetation, until I began to reflect that these valleys are alluvial deposits of comparatively recent date—of wonderfully fertile soil, in many places hundreds of feet in depth, bathed with an almost endless sunshine and quickened with the distributed waters of these mountain canyons, with little or no frost to retard the ever-growing season—then it was that I could begin to account for the size of an eucalyptus tree, which stands within ten feet of where I am writing, eight years from the seed and measures eight feet and eight inches in circumference, two feet above the ground; it is estimated to be at least seventy-five feet in height. I have asked many a recent arrival to guess its age, with answers ranging from thirty to fifty years.

The rapid growing eucalyptus is no doubt going to solve the fuel problem of this part of the country, where we pay $10 per cord for wood, and not an eastern cord at that, getting ninety-eight feet instead of 128. There have been many eucalyptus forests planted here within the last ten years, which are yielding a handsome profit to the owners. The trees are cut off anywhere from ten to twenty feet above the ground and then start out anew for another growth. It seems to be a habit that seeds have in this country of growing right along after having been once planted. Barley will produce two and even three crops from one sowing. I have seen, as the watermelons and tomatoes on vines two years old as one would wish to eat.—Pasadena Cor. Detroit Free Press
