IN PARADISE

Nor, perhaps, could the maddest better encourage the sinking spirits of men encompassed with misery and a still more scanty commissariat, out upon the burning, eye-scorching deserts of the South, over-swept with dust-storms driven along by the fierce khamsin, the stifling barman, dry grain their food, alkaline water their drink, and dreary marching and wounds and death their only service. "That prophet I salute his holy call who finds not heaven to suit the tastes of all." And Mohammed and "Mohammed Achmed, his servant," it must be confessed, have found one very suitable indeed to the tastes of Arab folk. Their songs and their speech are filled with phrases significant of the yearning of those wild sons of a sterile land for the pleasures of green trees, sweet smelling flowers and bubbling water. Religion offers them, those men of hard lives and stern work—as the one supreme delight of the after world—the luxury of idleness.

They are not even to take the trouble to turn upon their beds of roses to eat and drink, for exquisite beings, blessed with perpetual life, will always be at their side to offer them all they want before they can even ask for it. The fruit will bend down to their lips, the fountains of exquisite herbs rise to them. They are never to grow older than the prime of manhood, and if they choose, may never, all through the cycles of immortality, stir an inch from the spot where angelic arms, carrying each from the battle-field, have laid him down on the perfumed sward under the tooba tree. No more carnals to drive. No more infidels to shoot them. Peace and plenty, perpetual youth, and sacred laziness. The birds even, in the boughs, are only to sing in numerous fashion. No ear-splitting clamorous song will be heard there. The arboreal choir will all be beautiful nightingales, singing through veils, as it were, the softest whispings of melody that shall never be the same long enough for the listener to recognize a tune twice.

The perfume in the same way will glide imperceptibly from one fragrance to another, and each in turn will be new and exquisite. The sherbet will be nectarous blends of all the hydromys, soma, and nectar that poets have devised for happy heroes in the "Cities of Reeds" and "Elysian Fields" and are to pass by subtle transmissions from rose to pomegranate and from citron to date; from orange to grape, and so on through all the pippins and berries of paradisaic orchards, favored with such fruits as saints have worked miracles with, such as tempted Eve, such as the champions of Christendom knew of, as the pilgrims found in the Master's garden, as heroes and goddesses have striven for—the apples of bliss and immortality. The hours, too—"the dark-eyed maids above"—even they are not to weary the eye by monotony. Sixty is the smallest allowance, the "half nations," as it were of a common, ordinary sort of true believer.

In exceptional cases they are to be in number beyond counting, and at the wish of their possessor they will change their age, their features, and their voice. It is not enough that they shall each be perfect way. Then, to think of it, superadded to all this the perpetual coolness of thick foliage overhead and gentle breezes, and, above all, utter and inviolable laziness! It is no wonder then that the maddest soldiers, released from the drudgery of battle, and sent to march and fight in the desperate Sudan, escaped from the tyranny of petty masters to fall under the unrelaxing despotism of a fanatical leader, should go to their deaths lightly.

They believe with a stern faith every iota of the promises of future pleasures held out to them, and on that belief gladly stake the wretchedness of their life and risk the brief agony of death on the battle-field.

"Faith, frenzied faith, once wedded firm and fast.

To some dear falsehood, hugs it to the last,"

And those who were in the Sudan bore ample testimony to the amazing, bewildering recklessness and disregard of pain with which these soldiers of the maddest came charging on to their fate.

The truth is, they looked beyond the British squares at the green groves of paradise. The glitter of the grim bayonets before them was as nothing to the radiance of the great gates that each saw opening for them. In front of the flash of rifles and the low-rolling smoke of the cannon, dull masses of men in gray, and camels in tumultuous motion. But further off, and visible only to the eyes of those crushing fanatics, were the fluttering of robes of green, with the shimmer of golden ornaments. Here, close at hand, were the furious roar of the artillery, the pitiless fusillade, the fierce clamor of men dying and being killed; but, above it all, the surr of the true believer, quickened by his mortal wound, caught his sweet liltings of heaven's singing birds, the murmur of the brooks in the leaves, the babblings of the fountains of Zouzan, the whistled carriages of those hidden pearls "the maids."

So they came on, they rush all together, in small parties, or even singly, to meet the death "which leads to paradise." Out from the ban, and from behind rocks they came on one against 100, dancing and shouting. What if they fell? It was an infidel's hand that laid them low. Their end was achieved. Or, if they reached the end of their line and drove their spears home before they went down before their bullets, all the greater was the gain, all the larger was the fulness of eternal bliss. The leaders of Islam have always known how to avail themselves of this intense confidence in the immediate possession of paradise. Mohammed himself never failed to employ it to the utmost, and his successors, on many a field of victory have proved its potency.

The Moslem sees his reward actually within his arm's length. He has only to strike and it is his. If he kills, or is killed, he is assured of the prophet's favor, and it is his killing he is doubly secure. The lives of such men are, after all, but dull processes. Their language, their philosophy, prove that they feel this themselves. They do not cling to life as a precious provision, but are ready to throw it away. "Allah's will be done!" and there is an end of it. The more practical aspect of the maddest's proclamation, the fact that his followers are clamoring to be allowed to go to Mecca, we shall probably hear of later, for in the Moslem's creed the performance of "the greater pilgrimage" is in itself a passport to paradise.

For the present, however, it is enough to have noticed the strange phenomenon of such an appeal in these latter days of history, and to have hinted at the pathos which underlies it. Here fighting the Sudan under a sun that is now torrid, in the midst of a country brought to the misery of famine by three years of war, we had a military leader casting upon his troops to stand by him, and to rally for further effort with the promise of shady trees and cool water. They are not to strike for country, or for sovereign, or for God, but for refreshing draughts and the smiles of the hours of heaven. And this suffices.
