Try This If You Have Dandruff

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely and that is to dissolve it. This destroys it entirely. To do this, just get about four ounces of plain, ordinary liquid arvon; apply it at night when retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

through the open door. The house had become a tiny hospital, and in the spare room where Marion Marlett had been a recruit now lay with a country doctor working over him.

"Where is she—the girl I brought here?" Jim demanded of the woman. "Oh, we brought her about right quick," the woman boasted. "She wasn't hurt much—the lovely little lady. She was only a bit faint and dizzy."

"Where did she go?" The woman didn't know. She supposed the girl went down toward the wreck. Anyway, she went out by herself and quite all right, the woman thought, though in queer clothes.

The notes of a single call echoed over the field. Jim did not recognize the call, but its meaning was obvious. The scattered infantrymen and cavalrymen were being recalled. Jim returned to the track. Two more trains from the west had come up and stopped behind the troop train which had brought the cavalry. The headlight of a west-bound train glared at the wreck from the other side of the river. Other trains stood in a long line behind it. Some of the passengers from those trains from the east crossed the river and mingled with the soldiers. These passengers were refugees, too, of the sort which Jim had seen in the station at Chicago. Jim heard first from one of these refugees—a woman—that soldiers under the direction of officers were stripping certain of the dead so that live soldiers could wear their uniforms.

An hour after sunrise the train at last got away. By noon, running through Ohio, it began to pass trains full of refugees who had fled from the coast after it was known that the American fleet was destroyed. Company F ate once during the day. It was at Cleveland, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The train stopped there to change engines. There were no arrangements made to supply the soldiers. The company officers learned that the train would stay there for at least half an hour, and every one was told to go out and forage for himself.

Jim gazed out the open window at his elbow. A wide river with high banks lay before him—the Hudson a few miles below Poughkeepsie. A large passenger steamer of the sort which ply between New York and Albany was midstream, steaming north. Its decks were crowded with people far beyond any legal limit. Indeed, it was so packed that the train, that no more people possibly could be packed aboard. A brown freight steamer—an ocean tramp, whose pilot plainly was following the deepest channel as shown by the course of the Albany boat—was close behind. It carried no cargo. It was high out of the water, but its decks were jammed with passengers, and heads protruded from the open port.

Other light seagoing craft and harbor boats now appeared. There was a tug, belching smoke, towing a string of lighters and scows. People packed the tug's narrow deck, and the tow-boats were black and speckled with their human freight. Motor launches sped swiftly up the river in the shallower waters near the graceful private yachts which rushed past the scows. The yachts were private no longer. The only space which was unoccupied was upon the crafts which were scurrying downstream. Their decks were absolutely deserted. The fugitives no longer could be numbered by the thousands. They were countless.

"How long have we been passing that sort of thing?" Jim appealed in amazement to Kilbane. "Since we've been beside the river," the Irishman returned. "I woke beyond Albany."

"Thousands! There must be millions in flight. Across the river, below the high banks, the trains on the West Shore railroad were in plain sight. One long line of cars followed another, freight trains filling the gaps between passenger trains.

"They're hauling population to be freight over there the same as here," Kilbane observed.

Jim gazed out the windows on the other side of his car. A freight train was passing. Every car was crowded with people. The traffic on the two north bound tracks of the New York Central was almost continuous. Empty trains were returning to the great city on the other south bound track.

"They're shelling New York, ye've heard," Kilbane explained. "How?" Jim asked.

"Part by airship—dropping bombs. Part by gun from the sea." "From the sea? The Sandy Hook forts have fallen?"

"The ships that're doing the business are off beyond range from Sandy Hook. I heard they're ever be Rofkaway beach tossing 't' big burstin' boys over Brooklyn—a matter of fifteen or eighteen miles, they say."

Soon the train was rushing beside the Harlem river. It crossed into Manhattan, and above the noise of the cars there rose distinctly at persistent regular intervals of seconds the sound of shells bursting in the city.

Fort Hancock, far out at the point of Sandy Hook, was replying, every one knew. Perhaps Fort Wadsworth on Staten Island and Fort Hamilton on the other side of the Narrows were firing their guns. But the sound of the American guns came only as a low, distant rumble. The noise now and now and now was the detonation of great, high explosive shells striking only a mile or so farther south.

Suddenly the train stopped. It had not reached the station. It was still up above One Hundred and Tenth street. But something was the matter—perhaps only traffic congestion—farther on. The order came for the men to leave the train. The sound of the shells rose to monstrous, thunderous thudding. Jim took out his watch and timed the intervals between the eruptions. They came every six seconds, ten every minute as regular as the ticking of his watch.

"Boys, we can't try to form much here by the tracks," the company officers were calling. "Madison avenue is the next street west. Every one get over there as quick as you can and bring all equipment, please! Rally at company flag. We'll form over there and call the roll."

Thomas Lynch. By a strange trick of fate, Thomas Lynch, youngest "signer" of the declaration of independence, was also the first one of these men to die. Lynch was born in Prince George Parish, S. C., Aug. 5, 1774. He was only 25 when the congress declared the independence of the colonies. Ill-health compelled him to leave congress soon afterward, and near the close of 1779 he embarked on a vessel, intending to go to Europe for the benefit of his health. The ship on which he sailed was never heard of afterward, and the fate of the youngest of the "signers" remains a mystery. It is supposed, of course, that the ship sank and that Lynch and all on board were drowned; but there were rumors that it was blown out of its course in a storm and wrecked on a lonely island of the West Indies, and that some of the passengers and crew were saved. Thomas Lynch was educated in England and was the son of a wealthy South Carolina planter.

Quite, the capital of Ecuador, on the equator, has no regular water supply. Water-carriers bring water into the city in jars.

appearance of dilapidation and dejection, took the stand. "Michael Dougherty, look upon the jury. Gentlemen of the jury, look upon Michael Dougherty," said the lawyer. Then the lawyer himself silently and steadily gazed at Mike for a moment. Finally, with great deliberation and solemnity, the attorney turned to the jury and addressed it thus: "Gentlemen of the jury, do you mean to say to this court and to me that you honestly and truly believe that Michael Dougherty, if he had a pint of whisky, would sell it?" And Mike was acquitted.
