THE POULTRY YARD SOME POINTERS BY ED WEBER

It is rather surprising to an old poultryman to be asked what makes hens lose most of their feathers soon after midsummer. Yet that is the question coming from a reader of the T.-R. and a poultry raiser in Missouri. Still this querist is no more ignorant of some common matters than many who pretend to know it all.

He will know better hereafter, but without a doubt hundreds have been misled into sustaining the same loss. When I visited him he was mixing some kind of "appetizer" with his poultry food. I asked him what it was composed of and he said he did not know but it was said to be mighty good for fowls.

Did he show any more wisdom than the one asking why hens lost most of their feathers after midsummer? I notice that there is a good deal of ignorance displayed about the management of fowls when they are molting. Many poultry raisers are found who declare that they never have a molting fowl. That they dispose of every hen just as soon as she begins to molt. That is the chatter of the "smart." To carry a hen over in good shape, get her thru the molt and at business again of course requires sensible management.

If properly fed she will continue to lay all right until most of her feathers are off, but as soon as the new ones begin to grow it is practically a physical impossibility for her to produce eggs, because the very material that enters into the formation of eggs goes to produce feathers, and her system is unable to supply more than what is required for her purpose at one time.

Good Feed Necessary For Feathers. When a hen begins to grow new feathers, and ceases to lay, most poultry keepers think it is not worth while to waste any feed on them, and that is right where they miss it badly. Just at the time the hen needs quite as good feeding as when she is laying to enable her quickly to produce her new coat she is about half started, and the formation of her new plumage is delayed and the molting process is naturally slow and continued in cold weather, often until well on to Christmas. Then, very often, she does not begin to lay again until the top of the price for fresh eggs has gone glimmering.

In the case of the hen that is supplied with the material required for the manufacture of feathers, she keeps her flesh, strength and vitality unimpaired, and as soon as the coat of feathers is completed she begins to lay because her system is charged with egg material, and the formation of eggs is a simple change from the formation of feathers.

A hen so treated and cared for will, if given fair show produce enough eggs to buy herself two or three times over before spring. But her owner should remember that she should not be loaded down with fat. The food she needs is not such as produces fat, but flesh and bone—a nitrogenous rather than a carbonaceous food. A food that contains a good deal of lime, and fills rather than fattens. A small quantity of corn is all right, but bran, middlings, oats and foods of that character should constitute the chief food.

Feather Making Tests Vitality. The process of forming a new coat of feathers is a greater strain upon the vitality of a hen than the process of forming eggs. Hundreds of poor, ragged birds are kept shivering in the raw November winds and without a morsel of food in their crops, and their owners are just as keen for dollars as any body, but they were too stingy to provide their hens with the stuff that makes dollars. Carry your hens thru the molt in good shape and they will amply repay you for the food given them. Neglect or stint them and they will be a dead expense on your hands most of the winter.

Many an amateur has written me that his hens are not laying, though they look fat and fine, and he wants to know what is the matter. Usually he states that he has fed them lots of patented egg-maker, but is still shy of eggs.

Nine times in ten his hens have not fully completed the growth of their feathers, and until that is done he will get no eggs whether they be hens or pullets. The aim of the poultry raiser should be to get the crop of feathers matured early as possible, the earlier this is done the earlier they will begin to lay. And once getting them fairly started it is an easy matter to keep them going.

Don't sell off your best hens because you have been unable to induce them to lay when eggs were a good price, but feed and manage them right and you will find them more profitable than pullets. Now is the time to give them special care. The better care the more profitable they will be.
