His Conclusion.

When Willie was a boy he used to wonder if he would ever be rich—but of course he was too young to know.

When he grew older he argued with himself if smoking was really injurious—but he never settled the question.

Later he went into society and discovered that some women are pretty and that some bake good bread. He often thought he would marry—only he could never seem to decide which kind he preferred.

He grew mightily interested in science and thought he might write a book about something of the sort—but he never did.

He joined five churches, one at a time—but he never felt quite sure he had hit the right one.

He believed in single tax, socialism and high tariff—but he wasn't sure that things were not better as they were.

In time he grew gray and weak in the knees. One day he was taken very ill. He called in a homeopath, an allopath, an osteopath and an herb doctor.

They all prescribed—but he couldn't decide which medicine was most likely to cure him. So he took them all.

Then he died. And his friends felt that it was the best thing he had ever done. At last he had arrived at a conclusion.

MORELAND.

The little town of Moreland received with deep regret the news of the death of Geo. W. Gooch at Asheville, N. C., where he had gone in search of health. He left Danville Jan. 20, and only lived about three hours after reaching Asheville. His remains were brought back to Moreland Saturday morning and laid to rest in the Braxdale family burying ground. He had been employed for the last 15 years by the Q. & C. as a telegraph operator and was always mentioned as one of its best and most reliable men. He was 35 years old and leaves a wife and five small children, besides his mother and a host of friends to mourn his loss. The Moreland office will never seem the same to me, (since I can never meet my old friend again within its walls. George came to me while I was agent at Wilmore, 16 years ago, and spent several months with me, learning the profession he pursued until his death, and since he went out on the road we have been thrown together a great deal. He was working the first eight-hour shift at Moreland until last October, when he was forced to lay off on account of his health. He was a member of the Maccabees and Order of Railway Telegraphers and there was present at his funeral 16 brother operators, who brought beautiful floral designs. The Union church at this place was crowded with sorrowing friends and the remarks of Rev. Willis were very appropriate. I was so very sorry I could not get back in time for his funeral, being in Paducah when I received the telegram just two hours too late for me to catch the train that would put me home Sunday noon.
