

"Pickling" Fence Posts.

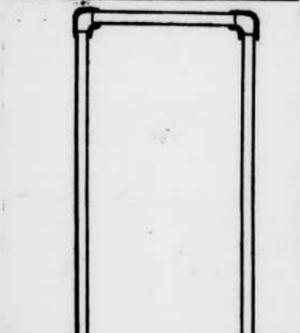

Treatment With Creosote Will Increase Life From Two to Eight Fold.

The time has come when it is cheaper to use treated fence posts of willow, cottonwood or red oak than to buy cedar posts or to use the others untreated.

A treatment with creosote or carbolineum will increase the life of a post from two to eight fold. The process is simple and the equipment inexpensive.

The plant, which any tinmith can make, may consist of either one or two tanks; the latter kind is capable of twice the speed of the other and is therefore cheaper to operate if labor is to be counted.

One upright tank three and one-half feet in diameter and three and one-half feet deep, and a rectangular tank 4x4x8 feet. These should be made of fourteen-gauge galvanized iron re-forced at the edges and corners with three-quarter-inch angle irons. If steam is available the oil can be heated with pipe coils; if there is no steam, a fire can be built under the tanks.

In case speed is not important the small tank alone may be used with a "U" shaped pipe fitted on the side, as shown in the accompany illustration.

Creosote or carbolineum is the preservative used—usually creosote on account of its cheapness. The small tank is half filled with the oil and heated to about 220 degrees F.

Every mile of fence put up in this way will save the farmer $5 a year when compared with white cedar and $9 when compared with untreated posts of inferior species.
