Rossman's Start.
"I can tell you a story about outfielders making errors," said Pitcher "Rube" Vickers of the Philadelphia Americans, while talking shop. "Why, I saw an outfielder have fourteen dies knocked to him in one game, all easy flies and get but one of them."

"How could he miss all but one?" was asked.

"Well," replied Vickers, "he'd either misjudge them or drop them."

"And he couldn't land but one?" was asked.

"No, he only landed one and thirteen hit the earth."

"How long did they keep him—an hour after the game?"

"Well, that's what they intended to do, but I told them they were making a mistake. I said the man who made thirteen errors of omission was a ball player, and that they would make a mistake in letting him go."

"He must have been a ball player to miss thirteen easy flies."

"Well, I tell you it is true that he only got one out of fourteen, but he was at bat four times that afternoon and he got a home run, a triple and two doubles. A man hitting like that, I figured out, could be kept on a ball club for his hitting even though he couldn't field muck."

"You see, this man was a pitcher when he came to us. He had lots of speed and a nice curve. But he couldn't get control and after he lost a few games because of his wildness they sent him to the outfield, hoping that he'd make a fielder and knowing that his hitting would not decrease."

"He won the game in which he made those thirteen errors, and after considering my advice, the owners of the club decided to keep him."

"He improved in his fielding and he seemed never to have a batting slump. His batting was the talk of the 'Way Down East' territory, and after a while he left us."

"Back to the bushes?" asked one of the audience of players.

"No, up to the majors," replied Vickers.

"We ought to have heard of him. Who was he, Rube?"

"Well, yes; you've heard of him. The man was Claude Rossman, and the club on which he played was Holyoke."
