Oh, Tom Tucker!

You and your home run bat are the royal rovers of Washington just what towns are to a loving grandfather.

Thomas was a hero yesterday. He had been hitting the ball hard from the seventh inning, and when he went to the bat in the tenth, two men were out, and the score a tie. He slammed away at a wild pitch, and a grand escaped from 901.

Thomas then hit the hardest-pitched ball he had ever seen. It was the last seen of the ball, and Thomas became a hero.

Far into right center went the ball. Dowd, turning his back to the spot, next he thought, get thee behind me Satan, meaning the ball of course, but the leather fell in front of the Quaker, and bounded into the bleachers. Thomas was batted at third, in a jest, and then went home on a grand slam, with the result that won the second game from the Philadelphia, by a score of 7 to 6.

The lighting of last night was no more brilliant than were many of the plays at National Park. Sharp as the fluid flashed along the dark clouds during the thunder storm, was the lightning of the two teams, especially in the seventh inning.

The ball left O'Brien's bat on a line to left, but the eagle Delahanty snatched the sphere as it headed the ground. And so with Abner's crack to left center which Cooley captured in a heart-breaking manner.

But the Senators also shared the glory that comes to plays of marvelous fashion. Wrigley electrified the audience by fanning McFarland's ground into the bleachers. In the ninth inning, a fly to the bleachers, and the end he sped the ball to Tucker and had his men by a step.

DeMontreville was a close second to the yelling on third, and even though he lost one man the game he put up in the nature of a conscientious widower wearing his second love.

The credit due Silver King for yesterday's game only those who have had a first-class banking institution can appreciate. Being hit hard in the second and third innings he continued in the box and kept the Quakers guessing as much as a game of roulette, and he was in the midst of the batting rally of the eighth when he died.

He did not finish the game, however. Old man McGuire was thought due to be a winner, and he was sent to the bat in place of the Bryan cross-twirler. Abney was an second on Cross' error and Wrigley's sacrifice, and one run would win. Cooley rushed in from center to Fife's. LaJolie joined the two and the Quaker on the rubber pitched four wide balls, which put McGuire on first. No runs were scored, as the side was easily retired.

McGuire pitched the tenth, and although DeMontreville lost LaJolie's grounder and Shugart made a single, clean fielding prevented scoring.

There was a repulsive feature to the game, however, in the second inning, which might have proved a serious affair. Stallings, the manager of the Phillies, showed himself in a character so foreign to what would be expected of a man in his position that the whole audience gave evidence of its disgust. Cross was on second and Nash hit a ball to Seaver and Wrigley, expecting the ball to be thrown to him, turned toward the fielder. Stallings was coaching at third and deliberately nudged Wrigley off the bag, and he collided with terrific force with Cross, who was trying for home in the throw. Both men were knocked out, and it would take several columns to note the criticism of the crowd on the actions of a man whom the National League and the straws are forced to recognize as a manager of the Philadelphia club.

The visitors were the first to score. Cross made a double and Nash followed with a single, which developed into a double because Empire Kelly's vision was somewhat clouded by reason of Stallings' endeavor to injure two valuable ball players. Then McFarland singled, and two earned runs were scored.

After this tussle King was himself.

“Plums” in This Pudding.

There is no dearth of large, choice plums in this Clothing pudding. You're not asked to search through "odd" sizes and "broken lots" of slow-selling Clothing in order to find a few real bargains. You are asked to take your choice of the entire brand new stock of the Continental Clothing Co. at half price. No other house in Washington ever offered you such a chance. We may never be able to quote as low prices again. Just think of it.
