Conspicuous among the new West end residences in Washington is the future home of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Nelson Page. Not only is its size equal to that of many public buildings, but it possesses an individuality that commands attention. In architecture the mansion is distinctly Southern, being a reproduction of a typi-cal Virginia homestead of the colonial period. The magnificent library and din ng-room, with butler's pantry in the rear. secupy the entire second floor, or, more properly speaking, first story, the house being of the English basement pattern. Mr. Page and his wife have but lately returned from an extended European trip, during which they collected a great vae adormnents for their louse. The author's wife was well known before their marriage as "the beautiful Mrs. Field," widow of a Chicago millionnire, whose vast wealth has rendered their louse one of the most hospitable during the social season of the Capital.
