

MINER-HERO WILL BE GIVEN MEDAL TODAY

This evening in the first-aid hall at Lucerne Mines, the first-aid association will present Joseph Tramontana, a miner of that place, their signal service medal for saving Galentine Gallopi, a fellow workman, from being electrocuted on Sept. 26.

Gallopi was standing on a projection high enough to allow his head to reach the roof of the mine and in the progress of his work his head became fastened between the roof and the mine trolley wire, carrying 500 volts. He threw his head sideways and when he realized what plight he was in he became confused and tried to pull his head out, as any one might naturally do. The result being that he was shocked by the strong current of electricity.

Tramontana, realizing the dangerous situation, pried Gallopi away from the wire by some means or other and applied artificial respiration immediately, continuing so for about three-quarters of an hour. This he did all alone, knowing that if he took time to call help, the man would be dead before assistance could come.

The clear judgment and knowledge of the remedy so thoroughly is all that can be said why Gallopi is still a miner today.

The medal the association is about to give Tramontana for his seavice is only given when the circumstances are above the usual run of rescues. This is the fourth medal so far given and the first that a Lucerne Mines First-Aid association has received.
