MR. SERGEANT BALLANTINE.

The Distinguished Barrister.

The oldest and the most famous of the distinguished gentlemen whose visit to Salt Lake we referred to yesterday, is a strong-faced, clear-eyed gentleman, apparently touching on the fifties. In one sense he is a disappointment to strangers when met for the first time. One who has such a magnificent record, who has been accustomed to receive honors in every place he visits, and who has won by his genius and great industry the foremost place in the harvest worked profession in England, might be expected to look careworn and over-strained, and somewhat indifferent to well meant greetings of newcomers. But the Sergeant is a gentleman of quite a different stamp. He has been a hard worker, but he shows no outward token of the fact. He is bright and jocund as a youth, and in his energy and sprightliness might set an example to much of the younger men of the time. It is this perennial youthfulness, perhaps, that is the secret of his great popularity in society. He is never the lawyer unless in his chambers or in the court. No dry as dust phrases fall from his lips in conversation; no musty, fusty maxims of the calf bound tome class are tolerated in his genial presence. Bright, witty, anecdotal always, he makes his visitors feel at ease in a trice, and so overflowing is his fun that it is at times very difficult to realize that the kind hearted genial gentleman who disarms all reserve is one of the most famous and successful lawyers of his age; and that underneath all that charm and simplicity of manner there lie powers that have won for him fair combat the greatest of his brother advocates, and that have in unequalled cross-examinations drawn out secrets from reluctant witnesses when all other men had failed.

Sergeant Ballantine was born in the law. His native place is London, and he is proud of the fact. His father was a barrister, and for many years presided as one of the magistrates of the Thames Police Court. From his childhood he lived in the atmosphere of Sergeant's Inn, and when he had barely attained his majority, had "eaten his dinners" and was admitted to the bar, and began his legal career in a dull smoke-begrimed room on an upper floor in Inner Temple Lane. In his "Experiences" which have obtained such a vast popularity both in this country and in England, he pleasantly relates how he spent the first few years of his residence "in Chambers." If much were not discounted by the reader, the Sergeant's earlier years were not devoted to much study. Midnight oil was burned of course, but not over Coke and Blackstone. His nights were not given to philosophy, unless the study of human nature with half a score kindred spirits over an occasional bottle of champagne, may be dignified by these terms. His labors too may have been heavy, but they were not productive of cash. In the first six months he netted the magnificent sum of $18; during the next twelve $150, and on the third year of his professional life his income actually reached the grand figure of $400. This, for a youth of free habits and of a generous money handling characteristics, was not a very bountiful income. But there are ways and means of living in London, that only a born Londoner can fully utilize. His father had promised him some assistance in the way of income, and on that promise he was forced to live with the aid of one or two confiding tradesmen of Fleet street. At last, however, even this resource failed him, and the light hearted, rollicking young barrister had just begun to turn his attention to some other method of "raising the wind," when one day, sitting in his chamber dreaming of the dinner that he had no hopes of seeing in reality, a knock came to his door and a brief was handed to him accompanied by a fee of $46. On this the young lawyer founded his fortune and his fame. Like many other eminent men he can look back upon this apparently trifling incident as the turning point of his career. That brief, with its modest fee, was the foundation of Sergeant Ballantine's fame and fortune, and although he afterwards has received at least one brief with a retaining fee of $50,000, he cherishes the memory of the former with as much pride as that of the latter.

His first forensic display was not a particularly promising one, and gave but little promise of the future that awaited the tyro. It is the old story. When he rose to make his application for a license for a theatre in the court, he was bewildered. His own words are: "I rose, but could see nothing; the court seemed to swim round, and the floor to be sinking;" and he humorously adds, "I cannot tell what I asked, but it was graciously granted by the bench." From this time forward, however, the young advocate's path was assured. The briefs came slowly at first, but they came, and with each an accession to reputation. His modesty and diffidence soon disappeared under the necessities of his professional duties, and while never neglecting the social pleasures to which he has always considered himself bound to pay the full measure of deference his reputation at the bar steadily increased. His choice of the home circuit or the metropolitan and adjoining districts was called a wise one, and when he subsequently attached himself to the central criminal court his success was assured. For some years the leadership of the home circuit was divided between him and Mr. Parry and the reputation then acquired formed a solid foundation for the fame which he won when he accepted what is called in English law the dignity of "the coif."

In the year 1848 Mr. Ballantine appeared as counsel before the House of Lords in opposition to a bill of divorce. Arrayed against him were five of the ablest barristers of the time, he alone opposing the bill. At the end of the first day the case was practically won through the skill of the young advocate, and Lord Lyndhurst, one of the most stately and reserved peers, came up to the bar and warmly congratulated Mr. Ballantine on the skill with which he had conducted the case. From this time forward there was no pause in his great career. His services were in constant requisition and more particularly in great criminal cases where his judgment shone out ever more conspicuously than in more strictly legal cases. It is a somewhat curious circumstance, and one not generally known, that although the learned Sergeant, is chiefly founded on his conduct of great popular cases, such as that of Madame Rachel, of "Beautiful Forever" notoriety, the Risk Allah Bey extortion action, and more recently the famous Mordaunt and Tichborne trials, his greatest legal and financial successes were won in election petition causes, and in the conduct of these he was practically without a rival. In them his unequalled skill as a cross-examiner shone most conspicuously, and cautious and secretive indeed was the witness whom the affable counsel, who never lost his temper, could not tempt into a betrayal fatal to the plea the witness was bent upon upholding. These cases, although now relegated in a great measure to the limbo of law books, excited great attention at that period, and Sergeant Ballantine's name was on every lip, and his wonderful cross-examining skill the common topic of conversation in society. Instances are on record where he achieved success when even the presiding judge had urged him to retire from a hopeless cause, and when his professional brethren, acting with him in the same, had virtually retired from its conduct. As for the advocate, he was in his element in these cases. He fairly revelled in them. None were too difficult for him to undertake, few, if any, that he did not carry to a triumphant issue. Curious stories were in circulation in London and which have been revived since his visit to this country, about the fabulous fees that were paid him in these cases. In how far they are accurate is not known, but it is stated in some journals, and has never been contradicted, that for some years his income from election cases alone averaged $100,000.

We have already referred to the famous Tichborne case in which the learned Sergeant led in the civil action for the plaintiff. Hedged in with difficulties of every kind, and opposed by an array of legal talent he maintained his position throughout and was never tempted into straining his privileges as a barrister, a course that ended so disastrously in the case of Dr. Kenely who defended the claimant in the criminal action for perjury that followed.

The Mordaunt case was the great cause celebre of the day. Our readers will remember that amongst the persons implicated as co-respondants, was the Prince of Wales. Among the evidence adduced were the letters of his Royal Highness to Lady Mordaunt, one of which began, "Dear Lady Mordaunt" and were certainly of a very inoffensive character. When the prince appeared in the box, he was not required to take the usual oath, and his evidence was taken on his word of honor. When the moment came that Sergeant Ballantine, who appeared for Sir Charles Mordaunt, was expected to cross examine the prince, expectation was on tip toe in the densely crowded court; a pin might have been heard to drop. The prince ever bland and smiling, awaited the dreaded ordeal. But the Sergeant was proof against temptation. "I have no questions to ask his Royal Highness," he said quietly and resumed his seat. The surprise was complete, and so was the popularity of the barrister in society. The counsel who declined to cross examine a prince of the blood was the lion of the season, and figured in Punch and the illustrated journals for many weeks afterwards.

Perhaps the crowning triumph of Sergeant Ballantine's career was his defense of the Galkwar of Barador, a Sndar Prince, who stood charged with conspiracy to murder the English resident, Colonel Phayre. The retaining fee that he received in this famous case was $5,000 with daily refreshers, the amount of which has never been stated. In the cross-examination of Col. Phayre, which extended over three days, the Sergeant brought to light certain curious facts about the civil administration of India and made the colonel the laughing stock of the country. The defense was a complete success and the Sergeant returned to England laden with the blessings of millions of the Prince's subjects, conveyed in glowing poems of stately eulogy and wreaths of choicest Sudar flowers, in the truly oriental fashion.

For some time past Sergeant Ballantine has retired from the more active duties of his profession, and it is only cases of great importance or cases in which he has a strong personal interest, that he appears in. He is still, however, in the prime of manhood and has many years of a useful work before him.

Somebody's Child.

Somebody's child is dying—dying with the flush of hope on his young face, and somebody's mother, thinking of the time when that dear face will be hidden where no ray of hope can brighten it—because there was no cure for consumption. Reader, if the child be your neighbor's, take this comforting word to the mother's heart before it is too late. Tell her that consumption is curable; that men are living to-day whom the physicians pronounced incurable, because one lung had been almost destroyed by the disease. Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery" has cured hundreds; surpasses cod liver oil, hypophosphites, and other medicines in curing this disease. Sold by druggists. 22c

Art.

We noticed two charming paintings from the easel of Mr. G. M. Ottinger, in the window of Savage's Art Bazar that are well worthy a visit from all who buy, and all who admire home productions. They are greatly superior to many of his earlier efforts, and show his persistent hard work; being full of soft mellow tints that are seen in works of mature artists. The subjects are widely different in their scope; the St. Peter Church is a beautiful spot near the east coast of England, and combines the rural beauty of English scenery, with a distant glimpse of the ocean beyond. The general effect is very fine and sets one to aying the grassy swards for which the old country is famous.

The other is a subject nearer home, and often painted, namely: Silver Lake, Big Cottonwood. The combination of lake, mountains and sky, is beautifully realized and faithfully represented. The two pictures make an elegant pair, and should adorn the parlors of some of our citizens. Nothing can produce more satisfaction than the preservation of original productions. The more our artists are encouraged the greater the stimulus offered to excel, and we are proud to say that Utah is not behind any of the surrounding territories in art development.

List, maiden, though you're keen of wit, And though of many charms possessed, You'll never, never make a hit, Unless with pearly teeth you're blessed. Unless upon your toilet stand, Your SOZODONT'S kept close to hand.

Burned to Death.

HEBRON, U. T., Feb. 27.

[Special Dispatch to the HERALD.] This morning about 5 o'clock, the citizens of our town were awakened with the cry of fire. It was soon discovered that the scene of the fire was on the premises of John Pulsipher, and in a room occupied by Prudence Macnamary Pulsipher, widow of the late Zera Pulsipher. When the fire was first discovered, the flames were issuing from every opening in the building, and through the roof, cutting off all possible chance of assistance from the outside. Following is the verdict of the coroner's jury:

COUNTY OF WASHINGTON, TERRITORY OF UTAH, Precinct of Heber.

An inquisition held in the house of John Pulsipher, in Hebron precinct, County of Washington, on the 27th day of February, A. D. 1882, before Daniel M. Tyler, Justice of the Peace, in Hebron precinct, county aforesaid, upon the body of Prudence Macnamary Pulsipher, aged 79 years, lying dead, by the jurors whose names thereto subscribed. The said jurors, upon their oaths do say that the said Prudence Pulsipher came to her death by burning while lying on her bed, during the burning of the room in which she lay, and that said room was accidentally set on fire by her own hand, about 5 o'clock on the morning of the 27th day of February, 1882, and further that we find no cause of blame attachable to any person or persons whatsoever. In testimony whereof the said jurors have hereunto set their hands this day an year aforesaid. (Signed) GEORGE A. BURTON, OSBORN W. HUNTSMAN, G. W. LAMB.

D. M. TYLER, Justice of the Peace, Acting Coroner.

Against the Ferry's.

On Tuesday P. T. VanZile, district attorney, pleaded suit in the Third District Court against Edward P. Ferry, F. A. Nims and the Marsac Company, to declare void certain patents secured by the parties named upon lands in the Uintah Mining District of Summit County, aggregating all told 160 acres. The action is brought to have the patents set aside and annulled, on the alleged grounds that they were secured by fraud and misrepresentation. The lands embrace the so-called Park City town site, and the allegation is they were obtained upon the representation of Nims that the lands were not of a mineral character.
