A WITCH STORY.

Eleven hundred years ago; you'll likely not remember, A witch was born in Gloucestershire, in wintry, cold December...

Old Satan worked with her so well, and aided her so nicely. No matter what the right desire he brought it round precisely...

Unlike the times of James I., when Bishop Hall said truly That houses were numerous than witches, most unruly...

So this old hag escaped the doom which might have been awarded. Had people known her wicked art, and learned whom she'd defrauded...

But Death at last had told the witch that Satan soon would take her, And drop her in the horrid pit, where imp in flames would take her...

The suns and monks, and all the tribe from monasteries adjoining. At her request came to her side, when words she was coining...

"A witch," they cried, "Oh, let's away! the Devil will us slaughter; This woman here we can't absolve, she is the Devil's daughter..."

My body from the fiend you'll save, if you will only listen. The priests knelt down, for now they saw her eyes with death did glisten...

With lead and iron fasten down the lid upon my coffin, hea wrap around some heavy chains— Ah! Satan's at my coffin!

Each night sing fifty psalms and fifty masses in the morning. Three nights and days are all I ask, then Satan I'll be scorned...

The poor old sinner gave a gasp—the breath had left her mortal body; "She's dead," said they, "She'll breathe no more, her flesh is cold and soddy..."

That night to church the monks did take the body of the sinner, The demons howled aloud outside, like wolves without a dinner...

The second night the fiends grew bold, the monks and nuns they frightened, And at the witching hour of Twelve their desperate lightened...

The lightning flashed, the building shook with awful peals of thunder. The priests and nuns did count their beads—they counted them still faster...

But now they saw that Satan had much greater power to worry— The monks the third night died; it put them in a flurry...

Each knock he gave he shook the earth; the monks forgot their paters, Their axes all had flown away—the Devil called them traitors...

Quick as a flash he went from sight, and bang! an earthquake shook the building. The windows all with sulphur gleamed, the lightning all the walls was gliding...

"Get up," said he, "you blamed old hag, it's time that you were frying." "I can't get up," the old hag said, "They've chained me down securely..."

He raised his foot and burst the bonds, "Get up!" he said demurely. The coffin lid then raised itself, the witch commenced a raving; Entirely nude she stood, erect a saint then, she was spring

The devil grasped her by the hand—with-out a speck of clothing— And made her mount a coal black steed, whose aspect set her loathing...

Now please remember, this I didn't see, I gave it to you just as it came to me: Though Satan I have never seen...
