THEORY OF CONCENTRATION.

Why Numerous Inventors Tackle the Ore Dressing Problem.

Mining men often remark the great number of concentrating machines that are on the market, and observe with some surprise that the number of devices for separating mineral of relatively high specific gravity from that which is low continues to increase...

The ingenuity and skill of the inventor is a matter of fact, each one that he can devise which will make a perfect separation of the valuable minerals, usually of high specific gravity, from the less valuable and comparatively low specific gravity.

Theory of Concentration.

Unfortunately for the inventors and makers of concentrating machines generally, here lies a physical impossibility, for it has been repeatedly demonstrated long since that it is impossible to separate a coarse and an extremely fine particle of heavy mineral from a relatively light gangue at a single operation, with the same grade of machine, the same vibration amount of water...

The combination of movements and volume of water which will accomplish the desired result is to permit the fine particle to escape, and vice versa. The grade, vibration and flow of water which will carry away the coarse grains and slimes of the gangue will also carry away with it the finest of the sulphides, and so on...

Necessity of Classifying.

This being the case, the necessity for classifying the pulp from the crushing machines, before concentration is attempted, is evident. This can be accomplished by the use of classifiers, or the employment of hydraulic classifiers. In the case of some ores, both devices may be used, and the results are better than the largest concentrating mills...
