

"Now the New Year reviving old resolves. The thoughtful soul much good intent evolves. Till the glad hand of some convivial friend Puts forth—and once again the world revolves."

The New Year opens quietly in a social way, nothing of especial note being planned for the week except the dance to be given Wednesday evening by Captain and Mrs. John E. Woodward at the post.

Christmas sounds are still in the air and echoes of the way in which the last Christmas of the present time was spent are still heard. There was one bunch of women who were accustomed to remembering one another with trinkets more or less costly who banded themselves together to spend the sum of money usually devoted to that purpose for some charity, and so well did they succeed that each and every one feels happier this year and better pleased with the outcome than they have ever been before.

But one of the best tricks turned for the glad tide of the year was by a small boy and girl, brother and sister, who have always had many of the good things of life, and who nevertheless knew how to share them. Finding that the children of the laundress, who had recently arrived from across the water had never witnessed the glories of a Christmas tree, this pair set about having a real one for them. They searched till twelve children had been found whose delight in a tree would be first-hand, and they laid their plans to make the event one of the most notable in their own lives.

There was one big motor car which was kept busy all afternoon Christmas day with loads of good things for the poor, and many a basket dinner which might otherwise have fallen short of its destination found a welcome place by means of the chug wagon. There are different ways of bringing good will toward men.
