upon me. I was about 18 years old, and for years lived alone in a rude sod house I had built the year of my settlement.

"Naturally, I was ambitious and tried to be industrious. I was inclined to sleep late, which a farmer should not do, and was at a loss to find a way of getting up promptly at break of day."

"One day I made a discovery. I had brought with me from my home town of Bethany, in Missouri, a lot of game chickens. I made a small cage in which I put one of the roosters and placed it beside by bed in the sod house, believing that the rooster would crow at early dawn and awake me."

"I look back with longing to the freedom of those pioneer days, whatever their hardships may have been, and especially do I remember my game chickens and the entertainments they gave me. These chickens were fighters from the forks of the creek. Running together constantly they fought little among themselves."

"In rainy weather, however, when I could not work on my claim, I would separate the roosters until they had somewhat forgotten each other, and then I would turn them loose in my sod house."
