HARD TO SHOOT WILD GEESE

They Are Crafty and Cautious in Their Long Flights.

Young geese near the remote breeding grounds and before they have been educated by the long, perilous flight from north to south and back not seldom behave in a fashion calculated to cast a doubt upon their intelligence, but that is a common fault of youth and inexperience. The two-year-old goose is a very different fowl, and if there be anything in feathers better able to extract chunks of solid wisdom from an experience with a trace of lead in it I have not yet met that bird.

Nor is it at all strange that the honker should be tireless in vigilance and exceeding loath to trust his big, shapely body too near any form of growth or shelter which possibly might conceal a man. Roughly speaking, the initial southern trip, from the fowl's birthplace to the winter rendezvous, is an airy jaunt of about 3,000 miles, more or less, at least one-third of which is punctuated with peril.

In all probability the true story of a goose's migration experiences would be something startling, especially in regard to the quantity of lead of various sizes vainly hurled after the adventurous flier. Would it be pounds or tons? At first glance the latter quantity might appear absurd, but it is not so. It is a fact that a goose is long lived, while nine-tenths of his would be destroyers use more lead than science in their abortive methods. In any event, if I had the choice of contract for carrying in a canoe the goose or the stuff that had missed him, there wouldn't be any hesitancy over the selection of the freight.

The fact is that the honker is the most shot at and the least killed of all our fowl, the reason for which is simple enough. Not a few old sportsmen and all new hands at the game underestimate by about one-half the distance at which a flying goose is passing. The bulky body and great wings make a noble spread even when a couple of hundred yards off, and only long schooling can teach the utter uselessness of trying at half that range with any standard gun. To a novice a goose actually within sure distance will appear almost on top of him, and it is only after a few fowl have been killed and the distance at which they fell noted that the eye acquires the knack of measuring with anything like correctness the deceptive mark.—London Sporting News.

Color.

Color is very commonly looked upon as a definite quality. This, however, is only partly true. The more correct and scientific concept of color is that it is simply the name of a certain group of sensations by which we are affected.

Thus we say "the rose is red." It is more correct to say "the rose produces in us the sensation we call redness." A man who is color blind will declare that it is green, showing that the color is not in the thing, but in the perception of it.

So far, therefore, from retaining their color in the dark, objects cannot properly be said to possess it even in the light. "The rose is red" really means that the size and arrangement of its surface molecules are such as to return that particular part of the spectrum which we have agreed to call red.

In the dark it is simply black or colorless, though it retains its capacity for again exciting in us the sensation of redness on being restored to the light, just as an empty glass retains its capacity for being refilled.

The Place For a Pupil.

"And there is one thing about the pupil of the eye that I can't say about lots of other pupils," remarked the teacher.

"What is that?" asked the scholars in chorus.

"It is always found up around the head."—Yonkers Statesman.

A Surprise In Store.

Begum (to himself)—I've got round that rich old gentleman of mine at last. She's interested in benevolent schemes and I'm helping her right and day to search out worthy objects. Today she said I'd have cause for rejoicing when her will was read. His Great-Aunt (to herself)—I had no idea my grand nephew was so good. It worries him terribly to see so much misery in the world. How delighted he will be to find that all my money is to go to the support of the poor friendless orphans.

Mrs. Wesley Davis, Wesley Davis school teacher, residence 517 E. Pike street, says: "My son, a young man of 22 years of age, complained a great deal at times of lameness and soreness in his back. Knowing that such annoyances were apt to grow complicated if not attended to he was induced to use Doan's Kidney Pills and procured them at Wells & Haymaker's drug store.
