CHET KEYES MAKES EVEN INDIAN LAUGH.

The stoicism of the North American Indian is proverbial. A hastily conjured mental picture of Poor Lo would probably consist of an expressionless red countenance, and a monosyllable "ugh." But last night at the Robinson Grand, where the Keyes Sisters are appearing nightly, tradition was cast to the winds and the Indian laughed.

During the action of the play, "The Girl of Eagle Ranch" Chet Keyes in the part of the colored servant, is alarmed by the sudden and unexpected approach of an Indian warrior. As Keyes retreated backward, in a sitting posture, from the savage, he encountered a tack, carelessly left upon the stage. Just at this point, Mr. Keyes gave the best imitation of a man sitting on a tack ever attempted upon the stage. It was then the Indian laughed, and he was joined by the audience, orchestra, ushers, stage crew, and even Charlie Bippus.

The Girl of Eagle Ranch will be repeated tonight, but the inartistic tack has been forcibly removed, both from the anatomy of Mr. Keyes and the plot of the piece. The tack has no understudy.

A. L. Connelly, of Weston, was a visitor here Saturday.
