WARNING

volt. This year some of these same townships did not cast a single Progressive vote, and the solid Democratic delegation of fifteen in Congress are not encouraged by this showing, as their one hope was for Progressive defection in Indiana, at least enough to aid in defeating Republican nominees for Congress.

"Our Ohio members of Congress possibly looked with more apprehension and concern on the Indiana result than in Iowa, appreciating that the Ohio Progressive slump will mean a less easy road to Washington next November."

As Mr. Garber paused a moment he was reminded that Pennsylvania also had a primary less than two weeks ago, and possibly he could comment on the result.

"It was coming to that," said Garber, who had paused only because of sorrow for old Democratic friends, whose greatest political woe of their lives seems imminent, and he added: "Pennsylvania Lunges Forward."

"Pennsylvania took a tremendous lunge forward to old Republican conditions, I am sorry to note as a Democrat, but we all appreciate that Pennsylvania can never be claimed by Democrats. The striking feature of the recent primary was the distressingly small vote of Pinchot, the Progressive candidate for senator, and looked upon as Roosevelt's personal friend and from whom he got promises to stump the state.

"Only two years ago Roosevelt and his Progressive party carried Pennsylvania by 51,807 and received a total vote of 447,426, yet we find Pinchot announced as the chosen one by Roosevelt receiving but a small fraction of the vote cast for his party in 1912; in fact, the figures were so lamentably less than those of two years ago that no one can find any paper that has published the vote.

"After much digging about I learned that the Progressive vote in Pennsylvania ten days ago was 48,250, which shows a drop of more than 89 per cent. This comparison shows a slump of 399,176 Progressive votes in Pennsylvania in eighteen months, and this falling off is discouraging to every Progressive in every other state, especially in Ohio, as the Garford-Garfield combination had expected a big showing by both Pinchot and others on the Keystone ticket.

Must Depend on Selves. "Now take it from me," continued Mr. Garber, "that in view of all that has happened lately to indicate the awful slump in the Progressive organization if the Democrats expect to win this year in Ohio, they must do it on their own account and by the efforts of their party organization and its candidates. They must depend as in other years on their standing as a great political organization, and just now the dominant one in the nation, rather than hope for success from the secession of the one-time Republicans.

"I took pains to look personally into the Progressive state meeting at Columbus three weeks ago. Alas for the claims, hopes and predictions of Progressive leaders in Ohio when they go home and become eloquent about the Progressive party in Ohio. In an audience of less than 200 persons, which were actually all the "Bull Moosers" could muster against the big Progressive conventions two years ago in Columbus, and the lamentable showing this year, there is the more wonder that any Democrat in Ohio can hope for any aid from the Progressive party.

"It is all very well to hug delusions in politics, but the Democrats of Ohio must appreciate from now on that a condition and not a theory or hope confronts them this year. If Willis, one of the three Republicans now in Congress from Ohio, is made the Republican nominee for governor he will not be an easy man to defeat in November. In his congressional campaign of two years ago he had
