Sketches of Little OLD NEW YORK by Wm. Payne

NEW YORK, Sept. 17.—The once nimbly skipping feet of Daisy James, a well known show girl, are gone but Daisy has harkened to the call of Broadway just the same. She lost both feet in a railroad accident in East Orange and her mother was taking care of her when she decided that she could not stay away from the bright lights.

Two of her former companions came after her one evening, carried her out to a taxicab and now she is living with them in a theatrical hotel downtown, she says she left her mother's home because she could not stand the quiet. She wanted to mingle with her old time pals.

When reporters called, she threw aside a gay afghan, showing the legs cut off just below the knees. "There is nothing more for me," she said. "I'm done but that is no reason I must forsake the white way. I can be an onlooker. I want a little peace so you reporters just tell the dear public that I intend to go on the stage as a tightrope dancer."

Col. John H. Davis, of Lexington, Ky., and Brighton Beach, N. Y., former jockey, trainer and owner of thoroughbreds, has just reached his ninth birthday. The large fortune he accumulated is gone and he is now caretaker of the New Brighton theater at Brighton Beach, Coney Island.

He occupies a room high up in the theater building, with a window facing the old Sheepshead Bay race track, where a quarter of a century ago he was paid a hundred dollars a day as jockey.

He sits at his window in the evening and gazes off toward the track, listening again in memory to the roar of the spectators and the subdued beat of galloping hoofs. "Do you ever watch the auto races on the old race track?" he was asked. He drew himself up proudly. "No, suh," he answered emphatically. "A contest is no contest in which there is not the element of speed and endurance of animal life."

Ned Wayburn has been fussing around the Century theater for six months getting ready to produce a new kind of a New Wayburn show. For seven weeks he has been drilling a chorus of 100 voices and 200 legs.

Wayburn, physically and vocally, is a cross between the Vicar of Wakefield and the traffic squad policeman at Forty-second street and Fifth avenue.

Speaking to newspapermen he is most benevolent in voice and demeanor. When he talks to the chorus the members thereof fall for the bit. Wayburn who is tall and has a modified front porch looks artistically to bowl out a chorus girl. He seems to get away with it in America, but he didn't in London. When he grew too caustic over there an unsympathetic stage hand dropped a monkey wrench on his head from the flies. He saw pretty little stars and fireworks for awhile and then for the first time in his life on the stage—grew calm. They carried him out.

Mayor Mitchell was killed theoretically in the battle at Big Hill at Plattsburg. The city mourns his loss—theoretically.

New York has its first Cingaleses restaurant. Twenty-one members of the Royal Cingaleses troupe of jugglers, temporarily out of vaudeville, are now balancing soups and curries before astonished patrons at the cafe on Eighth avenue near Forty-second street.

Just before the war a dozen members of the troupe went abroad to appear in Belgium. They have never been heard from so those who were left opened up the Ceylon East Indian restaurant. It is Cingaleses proprietor to dishwasher. Of course curries are the specialties in this transplanted bit of Ceylon. The Cingaleses, you know like their neighbors the Hindus, are keen for the hot stuff. Curry being the chief dish, hot mangoes and chutney are served on the side. Ceylon tea is used to remove curry burns.
