

ridden down Devisadero and had reached Haight street on Devisadero and had ridden down from that point. She was asked if she had ever seen the Laurel Hill Cemetery, to which she said she had noticed it particularly, and of this point Deuprey made much. Mrs. Crossett was particularly cross-examined as to her knowledge of streets in the vicinity of the cemetery, until the court objected.

"Were you then in the same state of health as now?" asked Deuprey. "Yes, sir." "Your movements were slow, were they not? Did it not take you about fifteen minutes to walk from Laurel and Washington to Sacramento street?" "I think so." "To the best of your knowledge did you do so?" "Yes, sir." "Did the car come at once?" "Very soon."

Then the witness was asked if she had had to wait long at transfer points and if there were any delays on the road. All these were answered non-committally by the witness, and then she was asked positively: "If it not take you three-quarters of an hour, at least, if not an hour, and wasn't it after a quarter past 4 when you reached Valencia street?" "No, sir; I had my watch," said the witness. Then followed more questions as to when she had seen the car, she had taken that day, but she gave no satisfactory answers.

"When you got on a car on Haight street, you got inside, which side were you on?" "That would be the west side. The person you claim was Durrant sat on the east side?" "Yes, sir." "The back of his head was toward you, wasn't it?" "Yes, sir." "How many persons sat there?" "I don't know." "And there was a young woman by this name?" "Yes." "Did you notice any one else. The conductor or gripman, or any one else who was on the car?" "No." "On Twenty-fifth street and San Jose avenue?" "No." "Then followed more questions as to how far this was from Valencia and Market streets, from Valencia street and from various other points, and the Deuprey got back again to the principal question.

"How long did you say you knew Durrant?" "About four years." "During that time how often have you seen him?" "Frequently." "What do you mean by frequently?" "Two or three times a month, and every month during that time?" "Have you seen him five times in your whole life?" "Yes." "Did you ever spoken to him?" "Yes." "How often has Durrant spoken to you, and you do not know him?" "Never." "You can't recollect the occasion?" remarked Deuprey insistingly. "No, sir." "Isn't a fact that the only time you saw Durrant at the house was several years ago?" "I don't know." "How many times since last February have you seen him?" "Twelve times." "I don't know." "Did you see him at all since then?" "Yes." "Do you know Maud Durrant, and have you seen Durrant since she went away?" "I don't know." "Have you seen him at all since then?" "Yes." "Do you know Maud Durrant, and have you seen Durrant since she went away?" "I don't know." "Have you seen him at all since then?" "Yes."

This remark aroused the ire of the court. The judge objected to the remark as it served to discredit the witness. "You will have ample opportunity, Mr. Deuprey," said the court, "to examine this and every other witness, but you must do so fairly, and I will not allow any such remarks to be made." Deuprey protested he had not treated the witness unfairly. "The court thinks you have," said Judge Murphy, and the order was made to proceed with his examination. Deuprey excepted to the language of the court, and then went on: "Did you see any one on the whole route from your grandfather's house to your home?" "No, sir." "Any one you can describe?" "No, sir." "Where were you on April 2?" "At home." "You didn't go out at all?" "No, sir." "And on April 1?" "At home." "Did you go out then either?" "No, sir." "Did you go out at all on March 31?" "No, sir." "How long previous to April 3 did you go out?" "I don't know." "Within five months?" "Yes." "Well, how long?" "I don't know." "Can you guess?" "No, sir." "Where did you go on April 5?" "To a friend's." "How long did you stay there?" "Two weeks." "What day did you return?" "I cannot place it." "Whom did you see yesterday outside of your home?" "No, sir."

There was no answer for a moment, and Deuprey remarked, "You can't recollect whom you saw?" Then he asked whom she had seen on September 1, then September 2, then September 3, then last Monday, then last Tuesday and Wednesday and down to last Saturday, but all the outsiders the witness remembered were Captain Lees and Detective Seymour. She was then asked why she had locked herself up and refused to talk to any one as to what she knew of the case, and she said it was because she thought it best not to do so. She said she had been told it would be best not to say anything about her testimony on the outside.

"For some months, have you not?" "For several years." "You are in somewhat advanced?" "I'm 71." "What is the character of your sickness?" "I'm troubled and heart disease." "What prescriptions do you take for your trouble?" Barnes objected, but the court allowed the question, as there might be a chance that some of the medicines would tend to affect her memory. The witness said she had taken several medicines, but took none now. She called seven or eight off to Deuprey, and he asked if she took them all every day. This she rather indignantly denied. Then after a few more questions as to her sojourn in Alameda, the lawyers for the defense held a long consultation with Mr. and Mrs. Durrant and with Harry Cross, and it was then rather suddenly announced that they were through with the cross-examination.

Then Barnes asked a few more questions with Mrs. Durrant's face situated when you saw him on the cars?" "How much of his face could you see?" "Nearly all." "And how much could you see when he got off?" "His profile." This ended Mrs. Crossett's examination, and she was led from the stand. Court then adjourned until this morning.

HEARING AN AGREEMENT.
Officials of the Rival Jockey Clubs Meet for Compromise.

Lack of Entries Compels the California Jockey Club to Postpone Its Opening.

The differences which for some time past existed in racing circles are now in a fair way of adjustment. To effect an agreement so as to avoid a conflict of dates in the programmes for the fall and winter races of the Pacific Coast Jockey Club and the California Jockey Club, a conference was held recently at the rooms of T. H. Williams, president of the California Club.
